I do not indorse the doctrine that Congress has not the power to discriminate. I do not see any limitation on the power of Congress in that respect; but I concur fully with the idea that it is bad policy to legislate in that way. I have seen nothing pointed out in the Constitution that denies to Congress the power to make different salaries for different members of Congress. It would be a very invidious discrimination, which it is not likely will be made; but if it be true that Congress has this power, and if it be further true that it is desirable to make the equalization, and it is done, on the theory that the party who has the money in his pocket ought not to have it there, the same reason that applies to the former Congress applies to this; the same reason applies to the Forty-second Congress that applies to the Forty-third Congress; and it is proper to say that members of the Forty-second Congress who received this increased pay shall have the extra amount taken from their pay until it shall be equalized. And it is in the power of Congress to go further, if you want to reclaim it, and say that not only those who are now members of Congress, but those who shall hereafter be re-elected, if any of them are ever after re-elected, who received any portion of that back pay, shall have it deducted until equalization is reached, so that no member of the present Congress, and no member of any Congress hereafter to be elected, shall receive any benefit from this extra pay. I do not see how you would reach those who shall never become members of Congress again, unless you say that if they shall ever hereafter have any dealings with the Government it shall be made an offset; perhaps you can get at it in that way. If you are going to do this, if you are going for a system of equalization on the principle that Congress has not the right to discriminate, where is the justice of stopping short of the back pay which has been so much talked about?

These payments, as I said, have been made monthly; the party that gets them is entitled to treat them as his private property. If you deduct anything from the future salary of a member because he has received them, you make a discrimination between him and the member who did not receive them; no matter whether you do it on account of what has been received the last year or the year previous, I cannot see any distinction, because these are not congressional payments; they are monthly payments. A month is the rest where you make the calculation.

I wish to say, furthermore, that I do not know that there has been a clear public sentiment expressed that $7,500 is an unreasonable salary for a member of Congress. I do not know to what extent that expression of opinion has been made. I do not believe that it is an unreasonable compensation. The majority of Congress did not think it was at the last session. I do not believe that one citizen in five hundred, if he understood the exact facts, would so regard it. I do believe that if we pay any compensation at all to members of Congress and hold out the invitation to all to come here, a sufficient allowance should be made to support them decently, so that they can live and pay their debts and be independent and respectable. I believe that that should be the rule. I have no doubt that it ought to be the rule.

But there is one thing in regard to the way this back-pay bill, so-called, was passed which is not thoroughly understood by the country. There had been various efforts on the part of some of us, who believed that the judges were not adequately paid, to increase their compensation. It cannot be possible that the people of the United States desire the supreme judges of the United States to be paid such a compensation as will not support them in the same manner that men in their station are ordinarily supported. It cannot be possible that the people of the United States desire the judges of the Supreme Court to be under the necessity of living in a garret or to be in debt for their board. I remember that nothing struck me so forcibly when I first came to Washington as to see that eminent and pure judge, Judge Nelson, under the necessity with his family of occupying but two rooms, and of being compelled to have his library in his bed-room. The compensation of that eminent man, who served the country for nearly half a century, barely paid his board; and he was not able to have a library apart from his bed-room in which to do his business. I talked with him about it, about the cramped way in which he was living. Said he, "My dear sir, I live on my salary, and have nothing else." He lived a life-time in that way. I am certain if the people of the United States had known how that pure and just judge was compelled to support himself at the national capital for a period of half a century, without sufficient money to rent a room in which to keep a few books and to have a separate place for his study, they would have said that it was absurd and mean, that it was placing the judiciary under temptations that were improper, and that for the just administration of the Government the judges of the Supreme Court should be paid a compensation that would support them decently as gentlemen and make them independent of money-sharks, make them independent of their board-bills, and enable them to devote themselves to the business of the country. Many of us had labored to raise their compensation.

It had also become a reproach that the President of the United States was still confined to a salary that was only thought sufficient in early times, when the purchasing power of one dollar was equal to the purchasing power of four dollars to-day. Every means was resorted to indirectly to properly compensate the President. Every means was resorted to by indirect legislation to support the White House; and still the fact remained that the salary was inadequate, and it was so admitted. But party exigencies prevented the neces sary increase. It was said: "It will hurt our party; we must not raise the salary of our judges now; we must leave the judges where they are; we must leave the President where he is; it is necessary for political ends that we shall not do justice." That was the argument.

At the last session a bill came here on this subject which contained some peculiar features. It had the back pay in it. That provision had been in all similar bills previously passed. It increased the pay of members of Congress. It increased the pay of the judges and of the President. It was voted against by the same men who voted against the proposition to raise the salaries of the judges when that stood alone, and who voted against the proposition to raise the salary of the President when that stood alone. Their votes never could be got. Party exigencies never would allow them to do what was necessary to carry on the Government. Those who were in favor of back pay, who thought they had not been sufficiently paid, voted for the bill. Those who believed that it was necessary, in order that this Government should be carried on properly, that the two co-ordinate departments of the Government, the Executive and Judiciary, should be maintained respectably, found in that bill their only opportunity for success; and, so far as I was concerned, I explained at the time my reason for voting for the bill. The back pay mattered little to me. It was only a few hundred dollars one way or the other. But there was prior to that time an unnecessary discrimination in favor of the Pacific coast in the way of mileage. It did not cost anything like the amount that was allowed for traveling expenses. Times had changed. We now travel by railroads. There had been complaints on that subject; and I was desirous that those complaints should be removed, and so stated upon that occasion. The back pay did not make much difference to me; but I was desirous to reach an end, and I believe the end we did reach justified the means, so far as my vote was concerned, particularly when I do not believe that $7,500 is too much pay for members of Congress; and I believe you will come back to it ultimately with the unanimous consent of the people when they understand the subject.

This matter was presented to the people as though there had been a general increase by means of the back pay. They complained of the back pay. They did not complain so much of the rate of compensation. If the bill could have been passed fixing the salary at $7,500 without the back-pay feature, I do not think complaint would have been raised about it; but unfortunately no Congress has ever been able to act on the subject of their pay without having some such feature in the law.

But so far as the increase of the salaries of the judges and the President was concerned, I am clear that it was a meritorious measure; that it was necessary for good government; I am clear that it was best for the country; I am clear that the American people desire that those Departments shall be placed in an independent position, and shall have a compensation that is at least respectable. I do not believe that the American people desire that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be in want of the necessaries of life, in want of what makes them respectable and comfortable, if they are to serve in that high place. The ordinary decent administration of justice requires that they shall be paid the amount they are paid under this law.

I am glad that I had an opportunity to vote for it under those circumstances, and these were my reasons originally. But if we are going into this paltry business of equalizing, let us make an offset against any man who shall hereafter become a member of Congress of any claim he may have against the Government, and get as much of it back as we can by that process. I do not believe that the proposition that we cannot discriminate is a sound one; but I think that a discrimination is odious and contrary to the spirit of ordinary respectable legislation. I believe it is a kind of pettifogging legislation. Discrimination of any kind is unjust; but the power has not been taken from us, as it has been in the case of the bankrupt law and several other measures, for we are not required to pass uniform laws on this subject.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Nevada on that point. I think he speaks without consideration when he makes that statement so broadly. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] made the same statement if I understood him, and that was, that he was in very great doubt whether we were obliged to make the pay uniform, and, if I understood him aright, that certain persons had suggested that it need not be uniform. The Senator from Nevada is again recurring to the same proposition which he made a short time ago. Now, Mr. President, it at once occurred to my mind that if that were so, it was a power which enabled a majority of the Congress of the United States, or a majority of the Senate, to keep permanent control of the Government.

Mr. STEWART. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. STOCKTON. I will detain the Senator but a moment. They could say, for example, that the Senators from New Jersey shall receive no compensation directly as an amendment. I can move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, in addition to those who are prevented from receiving over a certain sum on account of their having received pro rata their share of the sum of $7,500 from the 4th of March, by attaching the Senator from Ohio by name—that Senator THURMAN, of Ohio, shall hereafter receive no compensation. And that is embraced by the proposition of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Nevada. It is manifestly unjust. It manifestly never was contemplated. Both gentlemen, I think, rather admitted that from the way they stated it, for one Senator pronounced it "odious," and the other did not approve of it.

Now, Mr. President, the words of the Constitution, as near as I can recollect them, are something like these: "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law." If any proper construction of that clause will enable Congress to make a discrimination when the terms are "the Senators and Representatives," I have not the power of making a proper construction of the English language. The language in the Constitution is as plain as it can be. The appropriation when made is for the Senators—not for one, or two, or three, not with any exception; it is the Senators and the Representatives that you must make the appropriation for. I suggest this not with a view of disputing the proposition of these Senators, but merely as a suggestion to them that they overlooked the plain meaning of that clause.

Mr. STEWART. The provision is: "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senator to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I was going to occupy but a moment longer; but if we adjourn over until to-morrow I may occupy more time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator objects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will allow those papers to be laid before the Senate first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For that purpose, certainly.

STEAMER VIRGINIUS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message of December last I gave reason to expect that when the full and accurate text of the correspondence relating to the steamer Virginius, which had been telegraphed in cipher, should be received, the papers concerning the capture of the vessel, the execution of a part of its passengers and crew, and the restoration of the ship and the survivors would be transmitted to Congress.

In compliance with the expectations then held out, I now transmit the papers and correspondence on that subject.

On the 26th day of September, 1870, the Virginius was registered in the custom-house at New York as the property of a citizen of the United States, he having first made oath, as required by law, that he was "the true and only owner of the said vessel, and that there was no subject or citizen of any foreign prince or state, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, interested therein."

Having complied with the requisites of the statute in that behalf, she cleared in the usual way for the port of Curaçoa, and on or about the 4th day of October, 1870, sailed for that port.

It is not disputed that she made the voyage according to her clearance, nor that, from that day to this, she has not returned within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. It is also understood that she preserved her American papers, and that, when within foreign ports, she made the practice of putting forth a claim to American nationality, which was recognized by the authorities at such ports.

When, therefore, she left the port of Kingston in October last, under the flag of the United States, she would appear to have had, as against all powers except the United States, the right to fly that flag, and to claim its protection, as enjoyed by all regularly documented vessels registered as part of our commercial marine.

No state of war existed, conferring upon a maritime power the right to molest and detain upon the high seas a documented vessel, and it cannot be pretended that the Virginius had placed herself without the pale of all law by acts of piracy against the human race.

If her papers were irregular or fraudulent, the offense was one against the laws of the United States, justiciable only in their tribunals.

When, therefore, it became known that the Virginius had been captured on the high seas by a Spanish man-of-war, that the American flag had been hauled down by the captors, that the vessel had been carried to a Spanish port, and that Spanish tribunals were taking jurisdiction over the persons of those found on her, and exercising that jurisdiction upon American citizens, not only in violation of the rules of international law, but in contravention of the provisions of the treaty of 1795, I directed a demand to be made upon Spain for the restoration of the vessel, and for the return of the survivors to the protection of the United States, for a salute to the flag, and for the punishment of the offending parties.

The principles upon which these demands rested could not be seriously questioned, but it was suggested by the Spanish government that there were grave doubts whether the Virginius was entitled to the character given her by her papers; and that therefore it might be proper for the United States, after the surrender of the vessel and the survivors, to dispense with the salute to the flag, should such fact be established to their satisfaction.

This seemed to be reasonable and just. I therefore assented to it, on the assurance that Spain would then declare that no insult to the flag of the United States had been intended.

I also authorized an agreement to be made that, should it be shown to the satisfaction of this Government that the Virginius was improperly bearing the flag, proceedings should be instituted in our courts for the punishment of the offense committed against the United States. On her part Spain undertook to proceed against those who had offended the sovereignty of the United States, or who had violated their treaty rights.

The surrender of the vessel and the survivors to the jurisdiction of the tribunals of the United States was an admission of the principles upon which our demands had been founded. I therefore had no hesitation in agreeing to the arrangement finally made between the two governments, an arrangement which was moderate and just, and calculated to cement the good relations which have so long existed between Spain and the United States.

Under this agreement the Virginius, with the American flag flying, was delivered to the Navy of the United States, at Bahia Honda, in the Island of Cuba, on the 16th ultimo. She was then in an unseaworthy condition. In the passage to New York she encountered one of the most tempestuous of our winter storms. At the risk of their lives the officers and crew placed in charge of her attempted to keep her afloat. Their efforts were unavailing, and she sank off Cape Fear. The prisoners who survived the massacres were surrendered at Santiago de Cuba on the 18th ultimo, and reached the port of New York in safety.

The evidence submitted on the part of Spain to establish the fact that the Virginius at the time of her capture was improperly bearing the flag of the United States is transmitted herewith, together with the opinion of the Attorney-General thereon, and a copy of the note of the Spanish minister, expressing, on behalf of his government, a disclaimer of an intent of indignity to the flag of the United States.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, January 5, 1874.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. It was my purpose this morning at the time I called up the pending bill to press it to a vote this evening. I learn from the Senator from Texas [Mr. FLANAGAN] that he proposes to address the Senate on the subject, but is not in a condition of health this afternoon to justify him in speaking. He therefore asks that the bill be passed over, so that he may have an opportunity to-morrow to talk upon it. I therefore abandon my first purpose of insisting upon a vote on the bill to-night, and shall give way to the motion of the Senator from Vermont for an adjournment; but at the same time give notice to the Senate that if the friends of the bill will stand by me to-morrow, I propose that we shall remain here until we dispose of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest I should be misunderstood by the people, who know I am very fond of money, according to recent reports, I wish to say that I am in favor of my friend's bill, if I understand it, and that is, a bill for the absolute repeal of all the provisions that we made last year on the subject of salaries, and with a provision also for reimbursing the Treasury as far as we have wronged it by taking the money out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, I say if it shall be so amended, I shall vote for that also. I made the motion to adjourn, therefore, not to put off the disposition of this bill, but because some papers that I have which may illustrate one part of the history of the passage of the bill, and which are of interest as respects the course of the Senate in respect to what it may do in order, are at my house and not here, and I should like to present them, if I can find them, to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not understand that the Senator from Iowa asks us to come to any agreement that we are going to sit out a bill on the second day of the session.

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at all. I only say that I give notice that if the friends of the bill will stand by me, I propose to insist on a vote to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. STEELE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1001) to authorize the justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Wyoming to make assignments of the justices of the said court to the several judicial districts of said Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON FORT BRIDGER RESERVATION.

Mr. STEELE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1002) for the relief of certain settlers upon the military reservation of Fort Bridger, Wyoming Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN LAUBE DE LAUBERFELS.

Mr. STEELE also introduced a bill (H. R. Mr. SMALL also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1008) in relation to salaries and compensation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Salaries, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY, ETC.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of diminishing the Regular Army, and into the expediency of discontinuing, in whole or in part, the work of construction, preservation, and repair of fortifications and all other works of defense; and for this purpose may send for persons and papers, may employ a stenographer, and may report in print by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CROOKE. I object.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved That the rules of the House be so amended that all bills for the relief of private citizens by name shall be filed with the Clerk of the House and referred to appropriate committees without printing.

CHOLERA.

Mr. DAWES. I have a joint resolution to which I think there will be no objection if I can be permitted to state briefly its purport and object. A few weeks since I received a letter from a former member of the House, containing suggestions of great importance in reference to the prevalence of cholera in the western part of this country, and expressing a desire that some investigation might be made. He addressed a similar letter to another member of the House, and also to the Surgeon-General. It made such an impression upon the Surgeon-General that he addressed a communication to a member of this House, accompanied by a joint resolution, under which he proposes, without the expenditure of a dollar in money, to make certain investigations which in his opinion will be of great importance in the preservation of human life. The gentleman to whom I refer is Mr. J. Proctor Knott, well known to every member of this House, both present and past. The following is the communication from the Surgeon-General:

WAR DEPARTMENT, SURGEON-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1874.

SIR: I inclose a form of joint resolution which will, if adopted, secure the report desired by Mr. Knott, as stated in his inclosed letter. The wording is such as to give all the latitude required and not require any special appropriation. I will forward a copy to Mr. Knott.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. K. BARNES,
Surgeon-General.

Hon. JAMES B. BECK, M. C.

The joint resolution was read. It recites in the preamble that epidemic cholera prevailed during the year 1873 in various parts of the United States, especially in the valley of the Mississippi, causing a deplorable mortality; and that it is highly important that whenever such epidemics occur, the facts concerning the spread of the disease and its mode of propagation should be ascertained as fully as possible with a view to the prevention or limitation of future outbreaks.

The joint resolution therefore authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to detail one or more medical officers of the Army, who shall, during the present year, under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army, visit the towns at which cholera prevailed during 1873, or such of them as in the opinion of the Surgeon-General may be necessary; confer with the health authorities and resident physicians of such towns; collect, so far as possible, all facts of importance with regard to such epidemic, and make a detailed report of the information collected to the Secretary of War through the Surgeon-General on or about the 1st day of January, 1875.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) was introduced, read three times, and passed.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House, under the order made on the 19th of December, resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil rights. The Chair directs the Clerk to read the Journal on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House then resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of the bill of the House, No. 796, to protect all citizens in their civil rights, reported yesterday from the Committee on the Judiciary, the pending question being on its engrossment.

Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; pending which, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That its further consideration be postponed until after the expiration of the morning hour, when debate thereon for the day, and first and second days after the recess, shall be limited to twenty minutes, and that at four o'clock p. m. on the said second day the main question shall be considered as ordered to be put; and Amendments proposed to be submitted when in order, by Mr. ELDREDGE, Mr. WHITEHEAD, Mr. POTTER, Mr. BROMBERG, Mr. COX, Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. JOHN T. HARRIS, were ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Under this order, made by unanimous consent, the House now resumes the consideration of the civil-rights bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBURN. I rise to a point of order—whether this order does not stand on the same footing as a rule, and whether like any other rule it may not be suspended by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. No; the unanimous consent of the House suspended the rules to make this order. It was done by unanimous consent, contravening all rules that stood in the way of the order.

Mr. COBURN. My point is, whether this order is not just such a rule as any other rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this was an order made by unanimous consent, overriding the rules. It is not a rule, but a mere temporary order with regard to the transaction of business.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the bill may be ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made a special order for Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day thereafter at that hour, to the exclusion of all other orders, until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. To avoid the necessity of having the bill read through now, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The right to make points of order will be reserved.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to say a word before the order suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] is made. The bill which he has just reported contemplates a reduction of the Army; and I think that it ought not to be brought before the House for action until the Committee on Military Affairs have had time to investigate the question whether the Army ought to be reduced. In the short time between this and Thursday next it would be impossible to make such an investigation. I think it is due to the Committee on Military Affairs that they should be allowed at least a week or ten days to look into this matter.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York indicate the time when he wishes the bill to come up?

Mr. WHEELER. I modify my motion by substituting Tuesday of next week for Thursday of this week.

The SPEAKER. In that form, if there be no objection, the motion will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to submit a proposition to suspend the rules, so that certain amendments proposed by the committee may be in order.

The SPEAKER. That proposition would have to come in by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHEELER. I think there will be no objection to the proposition. I ask consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended, so as to permit the Committee on Appropriations to submit for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, as amendments to the Army appropriation bill, provisions for carrying certain balances of appropriations for the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and the Commissary-General of Subsistence to the surplus fund of the Treasury; also for transferring the jurisdiction and hearing of certain claims for supplies furnished those Departments during the war to the commissioners of claims.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he make his proposition less restrictive and more general, so as to embrace all cases. If there is any defect in the law—and I understand there is—this provision, then, ought to be general in its character.

Mr. WHEELER. This is an Army appropriation bill, and the amendment is drawn to meet cases embraced in such bills.

Mr. COBURN. I again ask unanimous consent for the consideration of my resolution in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection; and Mr. COBURN'S resolution was read again, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of diminishing the regular Army, and into the expediency of discontinuing in whole or in part the work of construction, preservation, and repair of fortifications, and all other works of defense; and for this purpose may send for persons and papers, may employ a stenographer, and may report in print, by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks consent that his resolution may accompany the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The Chair hears no objection, and the propositions will be considered as adopted.

Mr. COBURN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the propositions referred to were adopted; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 30) to fill vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time. It provides that a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than members of Congress shall be filled by the appointment of Asa Gray, of Massachusetts, in place of Louis Agassiz, deceased; J. D. Dana, of Connecticut, in place of Theodore D. Woolsey, and Alexander T. Stewart, of New York, in place of William B. Astor, and John Maclean, of New Jersey, and Peter Parker, of Washington City, whose terms have expired, shall be reappointed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Was not that subject referred to the Committee on Education and Labor?

The SPEAKER. It was, before the recess.

Mr. GARFIELD. The reference was only in reference to one of the names. This joint resolution is the unanimous recommendation of the Board of Regents.

Mr. KILLINGER. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then let it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The joint resolution was so referred, and ordered to be printed.

THE RELIEF OF LOYAL CREDITORS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1010) to provide by law for the relief of certain loyal creditors whose moneys were confiscated by the Confederate Congress in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights, on which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor. The speeches by order of the House are limited to twenty minutes each.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I had a bill similar to this in my charge during the whole of the last session of the last Congress, but never was able to bring it to a vote of the House, and I have always deemed it my duty as well as my pleasure to seek an opportunity at some time to advocate its passage at length. I find that the objectionable features which were in my bill are not contained in this one. Besides, the general amnesty bill, which to a certain extent was coupled with this proposition, has passed the House by an overwhelming vote.

And now, believing that the bill now under consideration will commend itself to a large majority of this House; believing that this great people will never be guilty of denying to the colored man all the rights he is entitled to by equity, justice, and law; and believing no word of mine can add to the majority with which the bill will be passed, I will, rather than waste the time of the House, yield to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I return my cordial thanks to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] for his courtesy in yielding me the floor. He shows that he is willing that we shall be heard, at least if the blow is to follow. But I appeal to him and his friends to consider calmly before they strike this blow, not only at my section, but at the whole country, to which all of us ought to devote our best thoughts and energies. The passions of the war have subsided, or are rapidly subsiding. Let us control our actions uninfluenced by those passions. The country is now being pacified and reunited in sentiment as well as in fact. The people of my own State are exhibiting this sentiment in their public actions. May we not expect it to be reciprocated here, and to have a manly response to manly overtures for peace?

Mr. Speaker, our Government is one of limited and well-defined powers. Those powers are conferred upon it, not by the people acting en masse or in the aggregate, but by the States, each acting separately and for itself. The Constitution, which in fact makes the Government of the United States, was thus adopted by the States. Strong as that Government is, yet it is one of limited powers, and Congress, as its legislative representative, has no right to pass any law except so far as that power has been conferred by the States. Broad and comprehensive as it is, still it has a limit, a boundary, beyond which it has no right to go. When it reaches that boundary, the rights of the States begin and the power of the Government ends. By the Constitution the States have conferred the exclusive right on Congress to do certain things, and have surrendered other powers enumerated in that instrument. To that extent then, and no further, have the States surrendered their rights or transferred their sovereignty to the Federal Government. In all other matters not so enumerated the several States are independent. The surrender of rights by the States is only those necessary to form a federal system of government. All others are expressly reserved to the States and the people. Among the rights thus reserved is their power to govern and control their internal policy free from the interference of the Federal power. When this right is invaded and infringed by the General Government, it ceases to be a republic composed of the several States, but a consolidated government, with a legislative department which acts directly upon the people of the whole country. When it assumes to control the other departments of the Government, as it has done, it becomes in fact, if not in form, a monarchy or despotism. Mr. Speaker, let us examine the bill under consideration, and see how far its principles harmonize with the Constitution. In my opinion every provision of the bill is a plain, open, and palpable violation of that instrument. It proposes to regulate hotels, places of amusement, stage-coaches, railroads, cemeteries, benevolent institutions, and public schools, all of which subjects have from the beginning of the Government been peculiarly within the control of the States. If Congress has a right to invade the States for these purposes, then our State lines are imaginary, and our State governments but a myth, with no rights or powers not subject to the will of Congress. The friends of this bill claim their power to pass it under the late amendment to the Constitution, which reads as follows:

ARTICLE 14. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Fortunately for the country, and fortunately for this body if they would heed it, this article of the Constitution has just been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the celebrated Slaughter-house cases (16 Wallace, 37) it was contended that a law of Louisiana, conferring on a corporation the right to slaughter cattle within a specified boundary and denying the right to others, was in violation of the fourteenth article, because it deprives other citizens of their privileges and immunities and the equal protection of the laws. The Supreme Court held such law was constitutional, and that Congress had no right, under the Constitution, to interfere. In that case the Supreme Court hold that none of the late amendments confer any such new rights on the Congress, but leave the States to manage their internal policy as to them shall seem best, only guaranteeing to each citizen of the United States the same protection to life, liberty, and property guaranteed to its own citizens. The court draws the distinction between citizens of a State and citizens of the United States. Every citizen of a State is, ipso facto, a citizen of the United States, but every citizen of the United States is not a citizen of a State, and that the States may pass laws which affect their own citizens, as such, which do not affect the citizens of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I only have time for one or two extracts to sustain the position I have taken, but they are sufficient to show the enormity of this bill and that it is clearly unconstitutional. The court say:

Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are those rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but the body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions; and, in its judgment, it may think on all such subjects. And, still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in the cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching, and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

The amendment to the Constitution guarantees to the colored race, as to all others, the privileges and immunities of a citizen of the United States. The majority and minority of the court both concur in definition of these terms—that they mean "the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property." It is not pretended that any State in the South has denied these rights to any of its citizens, white or black, but that they are enjoyed there alike as at the North and elsewhere.

The construction given by the highest judicial tribunal in the land to the amendments to the Constitution makes each and every provision of the bill under consideration unconstitutional beyond all doubt. The object of these amendments was not to give larger power to Congress than it had before, but simply to bring the colored man on an equal constitutional footing with the white man, and so to protect him that he could not be punished by a law of any State which did not alike punish the white race. This bill descends to insignificant subjects on which even no State has legislated. It overleaps the ramparts of the Constitution, and at once enters the arena of the States and takes from them subjects on which they alone could legislate. The States have not undertaken to legislate upon the subjects of this bill, except as to schools and lunatic asylums, but if they should, the Supreme Court has said they have the exclusive right.

The State I represent in part has no law regulating the management of passengers on public conveyances or the frequenters of places of amusement, but leaves those questions to be governed by the own ers thereof as shall best subserve public interest and their own. For it so happens that the interest of the public and the proprietors of these various concerns is the same. Hence no one is injured. The General Government has no more right to say how the internal arrangements of travel on a railroad shall be than it has to say how any private institution shall be conducted. Sir, what would the elder patriots of our country think if they could come on earth and find the American Congress legislating as to how persons should ride on railroads; where they should sit in theaters; where the dead should be buried; that the African should be laid side by side with the white man, whether the friends were willing or not; and that Congress was trying to force the colored lunatic in an institution provided expressly for the white; that Congress was trying to force Africans into charitable institutions; and, last but not least, that Congress was forcing mixed schools against the will of the State and against the wishes of its citizens?

Mr. Speaker, they would say, "This is not the great Government we established, formed by the consent of sovereign States for the protection of the people. If so, it has degenerated into a mere despotism, dabbling into small things which are utterly disgraceful to the American Government, which strike at the very foundation of its principles, and must, sooner or later, destroy the whole structure; we fought for the sovereignty of the States and the freedom of the people, not for the degradation of the one or the oppression of the other." The bill under consideration proposes both.

Having discussed the power of Congress to pass this bill, I now ask the attention of the House to its effect as a practical measure, if it shall unfortunately become a law. It is based upon the purpose, the theory, of the absolute equality of the races. It seeks to enforce by law a doctrine which is not accepted by the minds nor received in the hearts of the people of the United States—that the negro in all things is the equal of the white man. And I say there is not one gentleman upon this floor who can honestly say he really believes that the colored man is created his equal.

Mr. RANSIER. I can.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Of course you can; but I am speaking to the white men of the House; and, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be interrupted again by him.

Mr. Speaker, I assert no new theory, unknown to the American mind or unasserted by American statesmen, North or South, when I declare that there is no real equality between the African and Caucasian races. I hold here, sir, a declaration of the general American opinion on this subject. What I am about to quote comes from a source to which no sectional or partisan prejudice against the negro can be imputed by any negro or any friend of the negro. I desire the Clerk to read as part of my remarks the passage I have marked in the book which I send to the desk. It is not necessary for me to say who is the author of the sentiment which is expressed in the passage which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I have no purpose to introduce political and social equality between the white and black races. There is a physical difference between the two which, in my judgment, will forever forbid their living together upon the footing of perfect equality, and inasmuch as it becomes a necessity that there must be a difference, I, as well as Judge Douglas, am in favor of the race to which I belong having the superior position. I have never said anything to the contrary; but I hold that, notwithstanding all this, there is no reason in the world why the negro is not entitled to all the natural rights enumerated in the Declaration of Independence—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. I hold that he is as much entitled to these as the white man. I agree with Judge Douglas he is not my equal in many respects, certainly not in color, perhaps not in moral or intellectual endowment. But in the right to eat the bread, without the leave of anybody else, which his own hand earns, he is my equal, and the equal of Judge Douglas, and of every living man.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is the language, sir, of the lamented Lincoln. It shows the estimate which he placed upon the doctrine of the equality of the races. The equality for which Mr. Lincoln contended was the colored man's equal rights under the law, not equality with his own race, which he thought and said was superior to the African race. This every one of you gentlemen on the other side of the House must confess. Free yourselves of partisan and sectional prejudices, and every man of sense among you will express precisely the opinion expressed by Abraham Lincoln in the language which has just been read to you.

Now, sir, what does this bill propose? It proposes to put all upon an equality, and to force it upon the people of the country whether they are willing or not. In my own State—I speak for that State alone, but what I say holds good throughout the South; and I appeal to the friends of education upon this floor to confirm me when I say that—we have a free-school system in actual successful operation, which baffles competition anywhere in this country—in Massachusetts, or in any of the New England States, or in any State in the North or West. There our schools are separate and distinct. Our constitution, adopted by what was known as the Underwood convention, composed of republicans, provided that we should inaugurate the free-school system by 1877. But a conservative Legislature in 1870, at its first meeting, inaugurated the separate school system, built separate school-houses, levied the tax, and the white people are paying that tax, and the colored people are getting the benefit of it and want no change.

I desire to have read here the report of our school commissioner. I want the Clerk, in his full and clear voice, to read it; and I commend it to the consideration of the philanthropic gentlemen on the other side of the House, some of whom have shed tears on behalf of the colored men. It ought to show them that by this bill they will do more harm to the colored man than has been inflicted upon him for a century.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION,
Richmond, January 3, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: The passage of the civil-rights bill now before Congress would immediately wipe out, or practically destroy, the public-school system of Virginia. There is no power on earth, moral or physical, which can mix the children of the white and colored races in the same schools. The fine educational work now going on in Virginia would be destroyed as rapidly as the forms of law could be gone through with. Indeed, the public-school system would scarcely have a friend left among the intelligent people of Virginia. I know these are the sentiments of the intelligent republicans of the State as well as conservatives.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. H. RUFFNER,
Superintendent Public Instruction.

Hon. JOHN T. HARRIS,
Washington City.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Next, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read the opinion announced in his inaugural message upon the same subject by our governor who has just taken his seat. I want gentlemen to see where they are drifting when they adopt the bill which they say is proposed for the benefit of the colored race.

The Clerk read as follows:

The constitution made it obligatory upon the General Assembly to provide for the gradual, equal, and full introduction of a uniform system of free schools into all the counties of the State by the year 1876. Our predecessors, undismayed by the impoverished condition of the people, and rejecting all arguments for delay, proceeded in 1870 to organize a comprehensive system of free education, now fully operating throughout the State, which challenges comparison with any organized scheme of public schools elsewhere, under which a sum of money is being annually expended, in impartially educating both races, not far short of the amount required to meet all other current expenses of the government, and this system has received the deliberate sanction of the white race, who chiefly contribute the means by which it is maintained. As respects all other interests as well as that of education our people are subject to no State laws except such as provide equally and alike for both races, without a single discrimination.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I next desire to have read an extract from the report of the superintendent of a lunatic asylum at the city of Staunton, in my State. We have lunatic asylums both for the colored and for the white. As poor as we have been, and poor as we are now, we have made provision for the lunatics in our State of the colored race. This is the opinion of the superintendent, Dr. F. T. Stribling, one of the most distinguished and experienced in the United States, expressed by him before the bill providing an asylum for the colored insane was introduced in the General Assembly of Virginia.

The reflection which we have been enabled to bestow upon the subject convinces us that it would be mutually prejudicial to white and colored, but especially to the former, were the two classes blended in one asylum or within the same inclosure. The principal reasons for this opinion are based upon a knowledge of the relation which most of the patients in our State institutions sustained to colored persons previous to their mental affliction, connected with the consideration that the prejudices existing when in health have been aggravated in all probability by the morbid state of feeling which insanity mostly engenders.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to have another extract read, and to say a few additional words. I hope no one will object, as I do not often occupy the time of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES.) Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am very much obliged to the House. We have now in our State an institution for the education of the deaf, dumb, and blind. It is in my district, and I desire to have read a letter from the principal of that institution, and I ask gentlemen to ponder upon the statement it contains as to what will be the effect of the passage of a bill like this.

VIRGINIA INSTITUTION FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE DEAF AND DUMB AND THE BLIND,
Staunton, Virginia, January 2, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 30th ultimo.

In my opinion, and that of all the friends of this State charity, the effect of mixing the races in this institution would be to break down the institution instantly, utterly, and forever.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES D. McCOY,
Principal.

Hon. JOHN T. HARRIS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know the objection that will occur to the mind of every gentleman on the other side of the House, and of every one here who differs from me on this question. They will say this is prejudice—unjust prejudice. Admit that it is prejudice, yet the fact exists, and you, as members of Congress and legislators, are bound to respect that prejudice. It was born in the children of the South; born in our ancestors, and born in your ancestors in Massachusetts—that the colored man was inferior to the white.

Mr. RANSIER. I deny that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not allow you to interrupt me. Sit down; I am talking to white men; I am talking to gentlemen.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I call the gentleman from Virginia to order. My point of order is that when a member ceases to address the whole House he ceases to have a right to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule requires a gentleman to address the Chair.

Several MEMBERS. That's right.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I did not desire to be interrupted, and the person who interrupted me was out of order in doing so. I merely made a side remark to him in reply. The gentleman from Massachusetts should begin correcting the evils on his right and not on his left.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir. I thank you, and will do so. I say, sir, that prejudice may exist, but it is a natural prejudice, a prejudice that God himself placed in the hearts of southern children and the southern people, and it becomes us to consider that prejudice in our action here. It is for you, gentlemen on the other side of the House, to determine whether you will invade the lunatic asylums of my State and inflict an injury on the unfortunate and already afflicted inmates of those institutions. It is for you, gentlemen, to determine whether you will not only invade the asylums for the insane, but drive the poor children of Virginia and of the South from the public schools, expelling the little orphans with fair hair and blue eyes, because they have been taught by God and by their mothers that colored children are not their equals. Will you invade the institutions for the deaf, dumb, and blind and force the colored race into those institutions when there is no necessity for it, when our State has provided for that class in separate schools and in separate institutions?

Sir, I turn now to the University of Virginia, and I call upon Massachusetts, if, indeed, she has left in her any of the spirit of her noblest patriot and greatest statesman, John Adams, who was the friend of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the university. Will you invade that institution, which lies at the foot of Monticello, where rest the honored remains of the author of the Declaration of Independence?

Sir, he founded that institution, and he loved it and cherished it while living, and he desired to have the memory of his connection with that institution preserved in his epitaph. You remember, sir, the inscription upon the tomb at Monticello, dictated by him in life: "Here lies Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, and of the bill for religious freedom, and the founder of the University of Virginia." Sir, that university was founded by Mr. Jefferson after conference with his old friend, John Adams; and now the descendants of Adams come here and seek to break up that institution by thrusting into it a race whose admission neither Mr. Adams nor its founder for a moment contemplated.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Virginia be disturbed if I ask him a question upon that point?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am never disturbed by my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia if there is anything in the charter of the University of Virginia, as drawn by Mr. Jefferson, which prevents the admission of colored students?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The charter is silent on that point, but by this innovating charter of yours you seek to force them in.

A word now as to railroads. I will ask my friend from Massachusetts, or the author of this bill if he is within the hearing of my voice, if he has not himself been many times thrust from a particular railroad car when his high position was not known, or if he has not been invited not to enter a particular car?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have not.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am glad to hear it. My friend, then, has been more fortunate than most of us. Perhaps he traveled on Massachusetts adroitness rather than by the rules of the company. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the people of my State and its representatives desire to have partisan and factious feeling buried. They speak in no doubtful voice. They use no ambiguous language, but through their chosen chief magistrate, elected by the largest majority ever given to a candidate in Virginia, speak as follows:

Virginia, recognizing no such obligations as bind to any national party organization, maintaining her fidelity to all who are and who shall become allies in the defense of measures calculated to secure the ends named, is ready to co-operate cordially with men of whatever party in upholding those measures, by whomsoever proposed, supporting those who support them and opposing all opposition to them. One of the articles, announcing the principles and purposes recently ratified by an overwhelming majority of our people, declares that, disclaiming all purpose of captious hostility to the present executive head of the Federal Government, "we will judge him impartially by his official action, and will co-operate in every measure of his administration which may be beneficent in design and calculated to promote the welfare of the people and cultivate sentiments of good will between the different sections of the Union." This article was no political expedient of the hour. It embodies the sentiments of honorable men, and binds by the obligations of good faith and justice. It pledges such liberal support as may be consistent with our principles and justified by the developments of the future. I recommend its reaffirmation by the General Assembly, if no untoward event occur to forbid such action.

In these expressions of the governor of Virginia in his message I doubt not the General Assembly will concur so soon as they have time for such a declaration.

Mr. Speaker, if this system of legislation is carried out it will sooner or later prove the downfall of our Government. History repeats itself, sir, and proves that no people will long endure such unprovoked oppression without an effort to remedy it. Thank God, these questions rise above party, and reach the hearts of men as well at one end of the country as the other. There can be no sectional struggle, but it will be a contest in favor of the sovereignty of the States, the rights of the people, and a republican government in fact as well as in name. When that day comes, woe to them who laid their sacreligious hands upon the Constitution—the bulwark of freedom—and trifled with the liberties of a generous people. They will find revenge as rapid as the whirlwind and as merciless as the angel of death.

Sir, I say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that no man desires the prosperity of this Government more than I do, or more than do the constituency I have the honor to represent. We want to see it go on prospering and expanding until all the world shall feel the beneficence and wisdom of our Government and the greatness of our country. I trust that the representatives of generations yet unborn shall stand where I stand and say, in the language of a lamented predecessor, "These, these are my people, and this, O t' is, too, is my country."

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me to say what I wish to say in twenty minutes; but I think I can do it in an hour. I would like it to be generally understood whether consent will be granted me to occupy an hour or not before I begin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES.) The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to occupy the time of the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I object.

Mr. ARCHER. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules, so as to give the gentleman from Georgia the extension of time he desires?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order.

Mr. ARCHER. Not on Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This discussion is proceeding under unanimous consent, which suspends all rules.

Mr. SENER. Can it not be understood that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS]——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is objection still persisted in?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] desires to have the same privilege in reply, and therefore I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] occupying an hour, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] occupying an hour in reply?

Mr. WALLS. If the order be made, will the additional time allowed be taken out of the time of other gentlemen who may desire to speak upon this subject?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no.

Mr. WALLS. If not, then I will not object; if so, then I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has ordered that the debate on this subject shall close to-morrow at four o'clock p. m. Of course, the consumption of additional time by these gentlemen will work the reduction of time for other gentlemen.

Mr. WALLS. Then I must object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] will then proceed for twenty minutes.

Mr. WALLS. At the suggestion of friends I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] will be entitled to one hour, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] to one hour in reply.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary; who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 474) to establish a post-route from the village of L'Anse, in the county of Houghton, and State of Michigan, to Huron Bay, in said county and State; and

An act (H. R. No. 481) making appropriations for extraordinary expenses of the Navy.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the civil-rights bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, before entering upon the discussion of the question now before the House, I have done what I never did but once before in addressing a legislative body; and that is, I have reduced to writing, in advance, what I propose to say. This I have done on the present occasion, as I did on the former one alluded to, because of the very great gravity, importance, and magnitude of the subject; involving, as it does, several of the most essential principles of all good government, and especially those upon which rests, the whole fabric of our complex system of free institutions.

I feel on entering upon it as the highest judicial tribunal of our land felt, as proclaimed from the bench when the same questions, in part, for the first time, came before that body for adjudication. They said, in what is known as the Slaughter-house cases, (16 Wallace, 36–83,) referred to the other day by Mr. BECK, of Kentucky:

> We do not conceal from ourselves the great responsibility which this duty devolves upon us. No questions so far-reaching and pervading, so profoundly interesting to the people of this country, and so important in their bearing upon the relations of the United States and of the several States to each other and to the citizens of the States and of the United States, have been before this court during the official life of any of its present members.

When learned judges pause in hesitation where safely to tread, in view of their responsibility in expounding laws, well may legislators pause in view of their responsibility in making them. It is in view of this responsibility on me at this time I feel the necessity of the greatest possible care in duly considering and properly weighing every word that may be uttered by me in the discharge of the high duty now resting upon me, that there may be no misunderstanding of what I may say, and no grounds for any erroneous report or misrepresentation of my own utterances as they go forth in my own words. Steady as well as skilled should be the hand of him who puts the probe about the "heart-strings of life" of any one single human being, however humble; much more should it be so with him who deals with questions affecting the vital functions of commonwealths, whether State or Federal. No graver or more serious question will perhaps come before this Congress—not even the currency or Cuba questions—than the matter now under consideration. In giving my opinions on it I shall be governed solely by my own convictions of right and duty, looking to the best interest of the people of the several States of our Union, in view of the powers with which I am clothed. What I propose to submit is intended mainly for the consideration of members of this House, and without any regard to their party distinctions. I shall assume, having no right to question it, that we all feel alike a heavy responsibility for our acts, not only to our immediate constituents, but to the judgment of mankind; and that, too, not only of those of this generation, either of one section of the Union or another, but for all time to come; for our deeds, whatever they may be, whether of evil or good, will live after us.

I am, sir, opposed to the passage of this bill, or of any of like import or character. The bill now before us is in these words:

> A bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whoever, being a corporation or natural person, and owner, or in charge of any public inn; or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required; or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight; or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institution, or any public school supported, in whole or in part, at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein, of any citizen of the United States, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured, in damages to be recovered in an action of debt.
> SEC. 2. That the offenses under this act, and actions to recover damages, may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed, as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

In assigning my reasons for opposing this measure, I shall state them, first, negatively; and, secondly, affirmatively. First, I shall state several grounds upon which I do not oppose it; next, some of the grounds upon which I do oppose it.

In this order, I announce, in the first place, that I am not opposed to it because of any opposition I have to doing full and ample justice to every human being within the legitimate jurisdiction of our Federal legislative powers. The chief end of all governments, whether State or Federal, should be the protection of rights. The great struggle of humanity from the first organization of society has been a strife between power and right. This has been the case in every form in which government has developed itself in all ages, climes, and countries, whether in monarchies, absolute or limited, in oligarchies or aristocracies, or democracies or republics, whether single or Federal.

The solution of the problem lies in the administration of justice. This depends upon the character of the laws, organic as well as statute, in each particular state or kingdom, and upon their correct interpretation and proper execution. Justice is the simple but magic principle which, in its silent but potent action, effects order and harmony, quiet, peace, and happiness in all political organisms, just as the simple but marvelous principle or law of gravitation produces those wonderful results of order and harmony witnessed in the material universe around us. It is the same simple principle or law of gravitation that molds an atom and shapes a world, gives form, position, and orbit to satellites, planets, and suns. It is this that keeps every particle of matter in its right place, and in its operations produces a universal fitness of things and that all-pervading concord of melodies which swell the grand chorus of the symphony of the spheres throughout the illimitable Cosmos. As gravitation in producing its results acts alike upon bodies small or great, upon atoms, and upon stars of greater and lesser magnitude, in proportion to quantity and quality, so justice in human societies or states deals alike with all classes of persons who come within the sphere of its operation. And so with distinct and separate sovereignties, powers, or kingdoms in their intercourse with each other. The true law of nations is but a summation of the principles of justice.

In the second place, my opposition to this bill springs from no prejudice, in the slightest degree, against any man, woman, or child within the limits of the United States, on account of race or color or previous condition of servitude. I entertain no feelings of that kind, and am not governed in my action here, nor elsewhere, by any influence of that sort.

In the third place, according to the method in which I propose to treat the subject, I wish now to say that my opinion of justice and its proper administration is not founded upon the doctrine of that dogma so generally announced and so pernicious in principle—"the greatest good to the greatest number." The true rule with me, even in our old organized system of State polity at the South, was, "the greatest good to all without detriment to any."

While I do not hold the doctrine of the equality of races of men, yet I do maintain the great truth, however paradoxical it may appear to some, that all men are created equal. This great truth was first enunciated by a council of States on the 4th of July, 1776. It was then adopted and proclaimed as it came from the pen of Jefferson, the chief apostle of liberty on this continent. This truth was never meant, however, in my opinion, to convey the idea that men were created equal in all respects, either in physical, mental, or moral development; but it was meant to assert the great law of nature, that all men have an equal right to justice, and to stand, so far as governmental powers are concerned or exercised over them, perfectly equal before the law. This is the right of all classes of men, whether white, red, brown, or black. This American principle is as broad as our jurisdiction, and as catholic as the doctrines of Him who first announced to the world the true principle of justice; that is, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise."

This requires no leveling of the population of a State, either upward or downward—no equality and fraternity, as announced by the Jacobins of France—but that every one should act toward another as that other ought, in turn, to act upon a reversal of their positions in the different and various relations of life, either socially, politically, or otherwise.

In further illustration of my views upon this point, and in this connection, it is not improper or out of place for me now to repeat what I have said on former occasions upon the same matter. I held, and have long been on record, in announcing to my constituents, even before the war, that if our then system of regulating the proper status of the two races among us growing out of the truth of their inequality "was not the best, or could not be made the best for both races," "it ought to be abolished." Nay, more; after the war was over I used these words before the Georgia Legislature, then reduced to writing as these are now, to wit:

Another one of our present duties is this: we should accept the issues of the war and abide by them in good faith. * * * One of the results of the war is a total change in our whole internal polity. * * * The relation heretofore, under our old system, existing between the African and European races no longer exists. Slavery, as it was called, or the status of the black race—their subordination to the white—upon which all our institutions rested, is abolished forever, not only in Georgia, but throughout the limits of the United States. This change should be received and accepted as an irrevocable fact. It is a bootless question now to discuss whether the new system is better for both races than the old one was or not. That may be proper matter for the philosophic and philanthropic historian at some future time to inquire into, after the new system shall have been fully and fairly tried. All changes of systems, or proposed reforms, are but experiments and problems to be solved. Our system of self-government was an experiment at first. Perhaps as a problem it is not yet solved. Our present duty on this subject is not with the past or the future; it is with the present. The wisest and the best often err in their judgments as to the probable workings of any new system. Let us therefore give this one a fair and just trial, without prejudice, and with that earnestness of purpose which always looks hopefully to success. It is an ethnological problem, on the solution of which depends, not only the best interests of both races, but it may be the existence of one or the other, if not of both. The most vexed questions of the age are social problems. These we have heretofore had but little to do with; we were relieved from them by our peculiar institution. Emancipation of the blacks, with its consequences, was ever considered by me with much more interest as a social question, one relating to the proper status of the different elements of society, and their relations toward each other, looking to the best interest of all, than in any other light. The pecuniary aspect of it, the considerations of labor and capital, in a politico-economic view, sunk into insignificance in comparison with this.

In the same address, upon the same subject, I also said that—

The duty of giving this new system a fair and just trial will require of you, as legislators of the land, great changes in our former laws in regard to this large class of population. Wise and humane provisions should be made for them. It is not for me to go into detail. Suffice it to say on this occasion that ample and full protection should be secured to them, so that they may stand equal before the law, in the possession and enjoyment of all rights of person, liberty, and property. * * * Legislation should ever look to the protection of the weak against the strong. Whatever may be said of the equality of races, or of their natural capacity to become equal, no one can doubt that at this time this race among us is not equal to the Caucasian. This inequality does not lessen the moral obligations on the part of the superior to the inferior; it rather increases them. From him who has much, more is required than from him who has little. * * * I speak of them as we now know them to be; having no longer the protection of a master, or legal guardian, they now need all the protection which the shield of the law can give.

Thus you have what I said to the members of the General Assembly of Georgia on the 22d of February, 1866. From this you will understand the extent to which I was then, as I am now, in favor of giving, by the properly constituted power in every State, to every class of individuals within its limits, including the colored race, the fullest measure of justice, as well as all those rights the free enjoyment of which constitutes what is recognized by all eminent writers upon public law as the entire essence of civil liberty. A denizen in all good governments is as much entitled to civil liberty as a subject or a citizen. There is, however, a very great difference between civil and political liberty, just as there is a vast difference between civil rights proper and some of those social rights claimed by this bill. I have no hesitancy in saying, however, in reference to one of its features, that under our law as it stands whoever pays for a first-class car railroad ticket is entitled to a first-class car seat, whatever may be his or her condition in life, and whether white or colored. If he be a colored man who pays for such a ticket, he is entitled to a seat of equal comfort with the white man who may purchase a like ticket; but this does not entitle him of right to a seat in the same car with the white man. Railroad companies, and all public carriers, have the right by common law to assign their passengers to such seats in such coaches as they may please, provided they are of the comforts and class paid for. This, however, is anticipating.

The address from which I have made such copious extracts, it is proper and quite pertinent for me here to state, was unanimously indorsed by both houses of our General Assembly. It is exceedingly appropriate for me here so to state, in order to show this House and the world that the Legislature of Georgia was then, and now is, as I believe, ready to secure to the colored race within their jurisdiction the amplest justice in the protection of all their natural as well as civil rights of person and property. If there is any class legislation there against the colored race, I am not aware of it. The laws of Georgia, so far as I am informed, provide the amplest protection and security for all the civil rights of all the inhabitants of the State, whether considered citizens of the State or of the United States, or of no State whatever; and if at any time it should be discovered that these laws are defective in any of these particulars, I should be in favor of a proper remedy by the proper authority. But this brings me to the second view I proposed to take of the subject. So much, then, for my reasons, negatively, for not supporting this bill.

Secondly. I am now to assign some of the reasons, affirmatively, why I oppose it. Pursuing this order, under this method of arrangement, I state, in the first place, I am opposed to the passage of this measure, or any one kindred to it, even if any of the rights proposed to be secured by it were properly just in themselves, because of the want of the necessary power, under the Constitution, on the part of Congress to apply the appropriate remedy by the enactment of any such law as this bill proposes. I presume that it will not be assuming too much to take it for granted that it will be admitted by every member of the House that the powers of Congress are specific as well as limited, and that all the powers which Congress can, legislatively or otherwise, rightfully exercise are held by delegation from the people of the several States of the Union. Where, then, in the Constitution is to be found the power which authorizes the passage of this measure? The power under which it is claimed, as I understand it, is derived chiefly from the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth article of amendment. It is true, in this connection, I have frequently seen reference made, also, to the fifteenth article of amendment. To see how far the power is sustained by the claim, we must therefore look into the purport and meaning of both these articles of amendment as they stand, without any consideration at this time as to their history, or how they became incorporated into the organic law of the Union.

The two sections of the fourteenth article referred to are in the following words:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Sections 2, 3, and 4 of this article embrace a number of different subjects, not at all germane to the one under consideration.

The fifteenth article is in the following words:

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The reading of the fifteenth amendment shows it has no application whatever to the subject. Its main object was to deny to both Congress and the States the exercise of a certain power.

And as to the first section of the fourteenth, all I have to say here is that it very clearly appears from its words that it has but two objects. These were, first, to declare the colored race to be citizens of the United States, and of the States, respectively, in which they reside; and, secondly, to prohibit the States, severally, from denying to the class of citizens, so declared, the same privileges, immunities, and civil rights which were secured to the citizens of the several States, respectively, and of the United States, by the Constitution as it stood before citizenship to the colored race was declared by this amendment.

As to the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment and the second section of the fifteenth, so far as they relate to the subject-matter of the body of each amendment, respectively, their clear meaning and import are to provide security to the colored race in the enjoyment of the privileges, immunities, and rights so declared, in the same way and in like manner as was provided for the security of like privileges, immunities, and rights of the citizens of the several States, respectively, by the Constitution before this amendment, and that no other remedy for a violation of the prohibitions on State action in either of these amendments was contemplated than such as existed for like violations of like prohibitions anterior to the amendments. The exercise of no new power was conferred by either of these new amendments. The denial of the exercise of any number of powers by the United States, severally, does not, most certainly, confer its exercise upon the Congress of the States. Neither of these amendments confer, bestow, or even declare, any rights at all to citizens of the United States, or to any class whatever. Upon the colored race they neither confer, bestow, or declare civil rights of any character—not even the right of franchise. They only forbid the States from discriminating in their laws against the colored race in the bestowment of such rights as they may severally deem best to bestow upon their own citizens. Whatever rights they grant to other citizens shall not be denied to the colored race as a class. This is the whole of the matter. The question, then, is, how can Congress enforce a prohibition of the exercise of these powers by a State? Most assuredly in the same way they enforced or provided for violations of like prohibitions anterior to these amendments.

The proper remedies before were, and now are, nothing but the judgments of courts, to be rendered in such way as Congress might provide, declaring any State act in violation of the prohibitions to be null and of no effect, because of their being in violation of this covenant between the States as set forth in the Constitution of the United States. No new power over this matter of a different nature or character from that previously delegated over like subjects was intended to be conferred by the concluding sections of either the fourteenth or fifteenth article of amendment. No such thing as the tremendous power of exercising general municipal as well as criminal legislation over the people of the several States could have been dreamed of by the proposers of these amendments. Such a construction would entirely upset the whole fabric of the Government, the maintenance of which in its integrity was the avowed object of the war. If the construction upon which this bill rests be a true construction, then you have power to prosecute and punish all those in Georgia and other States, numbering not only thousands but hundreds of thousands, who are seeking to avail themselves of the benefit of relief acts passed by their States, which acts the Supreme Court of the United States have declared, in the way properly provided by Congress, to be in violation of that clause of the Constitution prohibiting the States, severally, from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The prohibition against the States in the one case is the same in words and effect as in the other. To what monstrous consequences would not such a construction lead? It is my purpose, sir, to show, beyond the power of refutation, the correctness of all these propositions or positions.

First, then, that the chief object of the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment was, as stated, to make citizens of this class of persons there can be no doubt, or if there was any doubt before, it seems that there ought to be none any longer; for the Supreme Court, in the case before cited, said in direct terms of these parts of the fourteenth amendment just quoted, "that its main object was to establish citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt." So that proposition may rest there.

Next, as to the correctness of the other propositions, I prefer to rely upon the same high authority rather than to indulge in any process of reasoning myself. I therefore shall cite extensively from the same decision in sustainment of all the positions taken.

In speaking of that clause of the Constitution as it stood before this amendment, in reference to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States secured by it, this court distinctly asserts:

> Its sole purpose was to declare to the several States that, whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

And in relation to the powers of Congress to enforce such rights under the Constitution, as it stood before, by municipal laws operating over the people of the States, the court further asserts:

> It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove, by citations of authority, that up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But, with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government.

The court then, in reference to the powers of Congress to pass municipal laws as a proper remedy against the exercise of powers prohibited to the States by the Constitution, with great point and potency puts the question:

> Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

They answer it, too, with equal emphasis and power, in these words:

> All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever, in its discretion, any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment.

Further on, in the same decision, in speaking of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments and the heat and excitement of popular sentiment when they were before the people, the court gives forth certain other most important utterances on this subject, to which I call special attention. They say:

> Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States, with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States and to confer additional power on that of the nation.

Additional prohibitions imposed on the States severally, and additional powers conferred on the General Government, but none of a new nature or character. It is here judicially affirmed that all the essential features of our original complex federal system are still preserved. In substance it amounts to this, that these amendments (whether rightfully or wrongfully incorporated into the Constitution) do not change the nature and character of the Government. Soul-inspiring words are these! So long as an incorruptible judiciary shall sustain the pillars of the Constitution in their stately position, and the grand old Federal arch unbroken in any of its parts, no serious apprehension need be indulged in as to our future safety from the batteries of legislative demolition or reconstruction of the temple of our liberties, if the people of the several States shall continue equally true to themselves. The United States still exist as a Federal republic, and are not yet merged into a centralized empire. It is true the court here speaks of the States in union as a nation. This is also eminently correct as the word was here doubtless intended to be used. The United States is indeed, and ever has been, a nation, and a nation of the highest type. It is a Federal republic—a republic of republics. Hence, the armorial motto stamped upon the great seal, as it was in the beginning: E Pluribus Unum—a nation of nations!

But to proceed. I wish to call special attention to another decision, made by the same tribunal at the same term, (see 16 Wallace, 138–139,) giving additional light upon the true construction of the fourteenth amendment, which very clearly shows that the power claimed under it, even as it stands, cannot justify the passage of this bill, and that the rights embraced within its provisions are not of that character which can be rightfully legislated for by congressional enactment. I quote extensively, for nothing I could say could impart either force to the argument or clearness to its conclusion. They say:

> In regard to that amendment [the fourteenth] counsel for the plaintiff in this court truly says that there are certain privileges and immunities which belong to a citizen of the United States as such, otherwise it would be nonsense for the fourteenth amendment to prohibit a State from abridging them; and he proceeds to argue that admission to the bar of a State of a person who possesses the requisite learning and character is one of those which a State may not deny.
> In this latter proposition we are not able to concur with counsel. We agree with him that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States in that relation and character, and that it is these and these alone which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of them. This right in no sense depends on citizenship of the United States. It has not, as far as we know, ever been made in any State, or in any case, to depend on citizenship at all. Certainly many prominent and distinguished lawyers have been admitted to practice both in the State and Federal courts who were not citizens of the United States or of any State. But on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that, as to the courts of a State, it would relate to citizenship of the State; and as to Federal courts, it would relate to citizenship of the United States.
> The opinion just delivered in the Slaughter-house cases (16 Wallace, p. 36) renders elaborate argument in the present case unnecessary; for, unless we are wholly and radically mistaken in the principles on which those cases are decided, the right to control and regulate the granting of license to practice law in the courts of a State is one of those powers which are not transferred for its protection to the Federal Government, and its exercise is in no manner governed or controlled by citizenship of the United States in the party seeking such license.
> It is unnecessary to repeat the argument on which the judgment in those cases is founded. It is sufficient to say they are conclusive of the present case.

If it is within the reserved powers of the States to deny the right of admission to the bar to any who may be held to be her citizens or citizens of the United States, is it not much more one of her reserved rights to say who may, or who may not, be admitted into her public schools or other institutions?

Here I leave the question, so far as our powers over the subject-matter are concerned. I consider it as settled by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, so far as that tribunal is competent to settle any question of constitutional law.

But, in the second place, among the affirmative reasons for my opposition to this bill, I oppose it because of its inexpediency. Even if the power were, without question or doubt, vested in Congress to pass municipal regulations of this sort to operate over the people of the several States of the Union, I think it would be exceedingly injudicious and unwise to exercise it. Better leave all such matters to the States. In point of fact, I do not believe the colored people of Georgia have any desire for mixed schools, and very little, indeed, for mixed churches, as contemplated by this measure. The tendency on their part, throughout the State, in all the religious denominations, except the Catholic, is to separate from the whites in church association and organization. In all instances, within my knowledge, the whites have been perfectly willing, and even solicitous, for them to remain and worship in the same houses and before the same altars; but they preferred to go to themselves. So with the schools. They have no desire or wish for mixed schools composed of white and colored children. All they want is their right and just participation in the common-school fund in schools of their own. This they now have in Georgia. They also have a university for themselves at Atlanta, aided by the State; as the State university for whites is in like manner aided by the State. They have no desire for anything partaking of the character of social rights; and if the people, colored and white, in the several Southern States, shall be left to themselves to work out their own destiny under the present system, subject alone to the controlling law of justice, as before stated, without external interference of any sort, it will, in my judgment, be infinitely better for both races. Reciprocal duties will soon, of themselves, bring about as much harmony and concord as are usually found in any state or country. And in this connection I have no hesitancy in giving it as my deliberate opinion, that there is not a colored man in Georgia who knows me (and my acquaintance with that class is not very limited) who would not come to me for a personal favor, or personal counsel, or in case of real grievance for a redress of personal wrongs, with more confidence in my having justice secured him, than to any "carpet-bagger" in the State, however industrious he may be in sowing the seeds of discord between the races and vociferous in advocating the doctrines of the "civil-rights bill," so called.

Interference by the Federal Government, even if the power were clear and indisputable, would be against the very genius and entire spirit of our whole system. If there is one truth which stands out prominently above all others in the history of these States, it is that the germinal and seminal principle of American constitutional liberty is the absolute unrestricted right of State self-government in all purely internal municipal affairs. The first union of the Colonies, from which sprang the Union of the States, was by joint action to secure this right of local self-government for each. It was when the chartered rights of Massachusetts were violated by a British Parliament the cry first went up from Virginia, "The cause of Boston is the cause of us all!" This led to the declaration and establishment of the independence not of the whole people of the united Colonies as one mass, but of the independence of each of the original thirteen Colonies, then declared by themselves to be, and afterward acknowledged by all foreign powers to be, thirteen separate and distinct States.

It is not my purpose at this time even to touch upon any of the issues involved in the late war, or the chief proximate cause which led to it, or upon whom devolves the responsibility of its direful consequences. But taking it for granted that the chief proximate cause was the status of the African race in the Southern States, as set forth in the decision of the Supreme Court, to which I have first referred, suffice it to say on this occasion that that cause is now forever removed. This thorn in the flesh, so long the cause of irritation between the States, is now out for all time to come. And since the passions and prejudices which attended the conflict are fast subsiding and passing away, the period has now come for the descendants of a common ancestry, in all the States and sections of the country, to return to the original principles of their fathers, with the hopeful prospect of a higher and brighter career in the future than any heretofore achieved in the past. On such return depends, in my judgment, not only the liberties of the white and colored races of this continent, but the best hopes of mankind. And if any breach has been made in any of the walls of the Constitution in the terrible shock it received in the late most lamentable conflict of arms, let it be repaired by appeals to the forums of reason and justice, wherein, after all, rest the surest hopes of all true progress in human civilization. If, "in moments of error or alarm," we have "wandered" in any degree from the true principles on which all our institutions were founded, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety!"

This I say, in all earnestness, to the members of this House from all sections of the Union—South, East, West, and North; and especially to those who bear the party name of republican. If you, Mr. Speaker, and your political associates, be really and truly of the old republican school, then be first and foremost to rally in the support of the principles of the great chief who organized that party to rescue the Federal Government from centralization in one of the most dangerous periods of its history; and under the auspices of whose doctrines, when the rescue was accomplished, the country was so happy, prosperous, and glorious for sixty years of its existence. If you do not, be assured your opponents will rally again under the banner of their ancient creed, and seize it from the hands of those who profess it by name, but reject it by their acts—

> That keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

Excuse me, sir; please pardon something to an ardent nature. The dawn of a new epoch in politics is upon us. There will soon be a breaking up of the elements of present party organizations. The great and vital issue between constitutionalism and centralism must soon be directly met by the people of the States. Seven-tenths of the people of the United States, in my judgment, are to-day as true to the principles of liberty, on which the Federal Constitution was founded, as were their ancestors who in 1787 perfected its matchless and majestic structure. They are as much opposed to centralization and empire and the necessary consequence—ultimate absolutism and despotism—as the men of 1776 were. All that this immense majority now want for concert and co-operation are young and vigorous leaders, thoroughly in earnest, as well as thoroughly imbued with the importance and sacredness of the cause. Nothing will hasten action in this direction more than the passage by Congress of this bill, or any like it, because its unnecessary and irritating effects will strike chords which will awaken opposition in every State of the Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf.

A few words upon another point. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who has charge of this bill, referred in his defense of its provisions the other day to the citizenship of the republic of Rome, the like of which it seemed from his remarks he wished to see established by this Government. We would do well to consider that matter somewhat. By doing so perhaps we may profit by our pains and trouble. The great difference between this Republic and that of Rome we should never lose sight of. Ours is a Federal Republic; that of Rome was a single republic. In extending her jurisdiction over neighboring states or kingdoms Rome did not recognize that federative principle upon which alone ours extends, and upon which all affiliating neighboring States become incorporated into our Union. Rome did not allow the peoples of other separate and distinct nations coming under the protection of her eagles, as to general matters, to govern themselves in their local affairs as their own best interests might dictate to them; but she extended over them the absolute dominion of one single republic, and thus enlarged her limits beyond her capacity to enact just and wise municipal laws for so vast a country. She thus necessarily became a centralized empire, with its necessary ultimate result—despotism. To political organisms, as with all other separate organisms either animal or vegetable, there is a normal limit beyond which the vital functions cannot be performed. When this limit is from any cause transcended decay ensues, and with it death. Hence the decay and downfall of Rome, which is duly attributable to her accumulated weight of empire. And so huge was the overgrown carcass, when the vital functions ceased to beat at the heart and final dissolution came upon so immense a mass of materials, that such a pestiferous stench went up from the decomposing elements as sickened the whole political world and brought on a paralysis of civilization for centuries. This is the period known as the Dark Ages.

Not so will it be with us if we eschew the example of Rome, both as to the character of her citizenship and the nature of her single-republic centralization, and adhere steadfastly to the principles of our fathers. In the workings of our complex system under our Federal Republic each State is a distinct political organism, retaining in itself all the vital powers of individual State government and development; while to all the States, in joint Congress assembled, are delegated the exercise of such powers, and such only, as relate to extra-State and foreign affairs. The States are each perfect political organisms, with all the functions of perfect government in themselves, respectively, on all matters over which they have not assigned jurisdiction to the Federal head, or on which they have not restrained themselves by joint covenant in mutual prohibitions upon themselves. Under this system, adhered to, no danger need be apprehended from any extent to which the limits of our boundary may go, or to any extent to which the number of States may swell. For the maintenance of this model and most wonderful system of government, in its original purity and integrity, every well-wisher of his country should put forth his utmost effort. No better time for an effort on this line than now, right here in this House.

Let us not do by the passage of this bill what our highest judicial tribunal has said we have no rightful power to do. If you who call yourselves republicans shall, in obedience to what you consider a party behest, pass it in the vain expectation that the republican principles of the old and true Jeffersonian school are dead, be assured you are indulging a fatal delusion. The old Jeffersonian democratic republican principles are not dead, and will never die so long as a true devotee of liberty lives. They may be buried for a period, as Magna Charta was trodden under foot in England for more than half a century; but these principles will come up with renewed energy, as did those of Magna Charta, and that, too, at no distant day. Old

Jeffersonian democratic republican principles dead, indeed! When the tides of ocean cease to ebb and flow, when the winds of heaven are hushed into perpetual silence, when the clouds no longer thunder, when earth's electric bolts are no longer felt or heard, when her internal fires go out, then, and not before, will these principles cease to live; then, and not before, will these principles cease to animate and move the liberty-loving masses of this country. Dead, indeed! What mean these utterances just heard from the chief magistrate of the Old Dominion on his entering into office, to which he has recently been chosen by a majority of over twenty-seven thousand, in a State which General Grant carried last year by a majority I need not name? A notable point in these utterances is what he said in them of President Grant. Hear them, and judge whether they come from one dead or alive. Says Governor Kemper in his first message:

Adhering to those principles, Virginia seeks these ends: to secure and maintain her full constitutional rights and relations, and to perform all her constitutional duties, as one of the co-equal members of the Union; to exercise all rightful powers of self-government, and to determine, adjust, and regulate the internal, domestic, and municipal interests of her people, their relations and rights, including such as are known as civil rights, in strict conformity to the Federal Constitution and the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States expounding recent amendments thereto, and the respective powers of the Federal and State governments thereunder; to obtain an equitable settlement of her just claims against the common Government; to promote universal reconciliation upon the basis of equal justice to all the States and people; to cultivate harmonious relations with the common Government; and to yield a liberal support to every department thereof co-operating in the accomplishment of the ends thus sought. Virginia, recognizing no such obligations as bind her to any national party organization, maintaining her fidelity to all who are and who shall become allies in the defense of measures calculated to secure the ends named, is ready to co-operate cordially with men of whatever party in upholding those measures, by whomsoever proposed—supporting those who support them, and opposing all oppositions to them. One of the articles, announcing the principles and purposes recently ratified by an overwhelming majority of our people, declares that, disclaiming all purpose of captious hostility to the present executive head of the Federal Government, "we will judge him impartially by his official action, and will co-operate in every measure of his administration which may be beneficent in design and calculated to promote the welfare of the people and cultivate sentiments of good will between the different sections of the Union." This article was no political expedient of the hour. It embodies the sentiments of honorable men, and binds by the obligations of good faith and justice. It pledges such liberal support as may be consistent with our principles and justified by the developments of the future.

The principles here announced are in strict accordance with the old Jeffersonian democratic republican creed. As thus uttered, they clearly indicate more than the dawn of that new epoch and future new alignment of the elements of present party organizations in this country to which I have referred. They are the key-note of that movement stirred by these old Jeffersonian principles which, dead as some may suppose them to be, will, at no distant day, be the basis of as signal a triumph by that party which plants itself squarely upon them, whether styled republican, democratic, or by any other name, as was that achieved in 1800, under the guide of Jefferson himself. These are, indeed, the ever-living principles to which the country must return, and which alone lead "to peace, liberty, and safety."

Mr. RANSIER. I am obliged to the House for its courtesy in allowing me one hour within which to——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the gentleman was allowed an hour's time.

Mr. WOOD, Mr. HOLMAN, and others. That was the understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from South Carolina, for whom Judge HOAR obtained the privilege, was the colleague of the gentleman now on the floor: the gentleman on the opposite side of the aisle, [Mr. ELLIOTT.]

Mr. WALLS. It was my understanding, when I withdrew my objection——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman now on the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. RANSIER. Very well; I will endeavor to make that answer my purpose, and I will withdraw my acknowledgment of a courtesy not intended for me, but which I was under the impression was meant for me.

Mr. Speaker, being a "new member" of the House, I dislike much to attempt to engage just now in the discussion of any question before the House, but would prefer to listen to others, the older and abler members, in order that I might the more effectually discharge my duties as a representative of the people. Yet, sir, it would seem that I should feel called upon to say a word upon the subject now before the House. This I feel is demanded of me by my constituents, especially in view of the opposition to this measure manifested by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

NECESSITY OF THE ENACTMENT OF THIS LAW.

Sir, that there is a necessity for the enactment of some such law, and that, too, by Congress and not the Legislatures of the several States, as the pending bill, which I understand has received the sanction of the Judiciary Committee of this House, is at once apparent to every one in side or outside of these Halls who has a decent regard for the rights of his fellow-man and something like a just appreciation of the principles underlying the fabric of the Government under which we live. True, sir, that that which Tupper has described as "earth's worst abomination and nature's blackest blot"—American slavery—no longer curses our land; yet, sir, a relic of it remains in the conduct of a portion of our people toward another portion in nearly every part of our country. Five millions of people, citizens of our country, who bode you no evil, suffer to-day the most humiliating discriminations, in the matter of the most ordinary privileges attaching to them as human beings, because of their color and previous condition of imposed servitude. Political equality is vouchsafed to them, it is true, and it is said they ought to be satisfied with this; but, sir, these people, one of whom I am, are a part of the nation, this powerful, progressive, and Christian nation of ours, which has done so much for the civilization of the present century. They have contributed largely toward her wealth and bared their breasts in the face of her enemies, foreign and domestic, in the interest of her life and unification. They assist in the election of her rulers, bear their share of the burdens of government. They have established their loyalty beyond dispute; have given evidence of their fitness for political rights, and will be satisfied with nothing short of their equal civil rights, such as are enjoyed by other citizens. And may the day be not far distant when American citizenship in civil and political rights and public privileges shall cover not only those of our sex, but those of the opposite one also; until which time the Government of the United States cannot be said to rest upon the "consent of the governed," or to adequately protect them in "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

PECULIAR PRIVILEGES NOT DEMANDED.

The colored people ask of the country no peculiar privileges. But it is feared by the gentleman from Kentucky and those whom he represents in this matter of civil rights, that if we colored people are put upon a plane of civil equality with them in law—going into the same schools, hotels, and places of amusement, and into the jury-box and the cemetery—we, by virtue of our intellectual superiority and our moral and physical force, if not numbers, will absorb the race to which he and they belong. This is the logical deduction from the apprehensions to which he has given expression. Let me thank him, in the name of the colored people of the country, for the compliment he has, perhaps unconsciously, paid them: but I must here deny that that would necessarily follow civil equality in this country, or that there is any serious intention on our part to thus destroy those for whom he speaks or the race to which he belongs. We are known, Mr. Speaker, to be too magnanimous for that. If we are powerful, we know how to be merciful.

BUGBEAR OF "SOCIAL EQUALITY."

The bugbear of "social equality" is used by the enemies of political and civil equality for the colored man in place of argument. There is not an intelligent white man or black man who does not know that that is the sheerest nonsense; and I would have it distinctly understood that I would most certainly oppose the passage of the pending bill or any similar measure if I believed that its operation would be to force upon me the company of the member from Kentucky, for instance, or any one else. These negro-haters would not open school-houses, hotels, places of amusement, common conveyances, or the witness or the jury box to the colored people upon equal terms with themselves, because this contact of the races would, forsooth, "result injuriously to both." Yet they have found agreeable associations with them under other circumstances which at once suggest themselves to us; nor has the result of this contact proved injurious to either race so far as I know, except that the moral responsibility rests upon the more refined and cultivated.

BOTH POLITICAL PARTIES COMMITTED TO CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. Speaker, the necessity and the authority for the enactment of a law by Congress, to be made as far-reaching as the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States itself, which shall prevent or punish discrimination against the citizen in the matter of his civil and political rights and public privileges, may be summed up in a few words, although, sir, much, very much, could be said on either or both of these branches. The time allotted us, however, sir, is not sufficient for extended argument, nor did I at one time suppose that it would be deemed necessary that a member of Congress in this day should feel obliged to plead for the passage of a full and complete civil-rights bill, representing, as we do, the two great political parties of the country, both of which stand before the world committed to the principle of protection to the colored man, as well as to the white man, in the assertion and enjoyment of these rights, and both stand committed to the doctrine of protection by the national Government, the republican party at Philadelphia in these words:

Complete liberty and exact equality in the enjoyment of all civil, political, and public rights should be established and effectually maintained throughout the Union by efficient and appropriate State and Federal legislation; and that neither law nor its administration should admit of any discrimination in respect to the citizen by reason of race, color, creed, or previous condition of servitude.

And the democratic-liberal party at Cincinnati and Baltimore in these words:

We recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that the Government in its dealings with the people should mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political.

These are strong words, Mr. Speaker; and if the democratic party of the country, as well as the republican party, is not pledged, in view of these declarations, to equal civil rights for "all men before the law," "of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political," and to protection in their exercise by the national Government, then, sir, words mean nothing. We are not bound to accept these declarations in the sense of Talleyrand's suggestion, that language is made to conceal rather than to express our thoughts. We accept them as the solemn declarations of sober and earnest men—men who have studied the matter to which they refer; and, I repeat, they stand committed to the principle of protection to the citizen, and that, too, by the national Government, in the assertion and exercise of his civil rights, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Again, sir, it is obvious that they knew that there was a class of citizens laboring under civil disabilities, and professed to believe that they ought to be removed, else why put this plank in their platform at all? Sir, these disabilities exist, as is known to all of us, and painfully so to those who suffer under them. Colored men and women are excluded from our hotels, our common conveyances and places of amusement or resort, and our children from the public schools, in almost every State of the Union, unless, in almost every instance, they submit to unequal and degrading terms.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITIES ONLY DESIRED.

Mr. Speaker, all these people ask is an equal chance in the race of life, and the same privileges and protection meted out to other classes of people in our land. We cannot engage in the industrial pursuits, educate our children, defend our lives and property in the courts, receive the comforts provided in our common conveyances necessary to our wives and little ones if not essentially so to us, and, in short, engage in the "pursuit of happiness" as rational beings, when we are circumscribed within the narrowest possible limits on every hand, disowned, spit upon, and outraged in a thousand ways.

Mr. Speaker, the States will not give us protection in these matters, and well do these "State-rights" men know this. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia, I understand, professes to believe in the doctrine of civil and political equality for all men without regard to race or color; "but leave it to the States," says he, "where it belongs." Let me ask him if the State of Georgia, which kicked colored men elected to her General Assembly out of her legislative halls upon a convenient but flimsy pretext, because of their color, would likely give the class to which they belong equal civil rights?

STATE AND UNITED STATES CITIZENSHIP.

The States, as such, sir, have nothing to do with the regulation or protection of the rights and privileges of American citizenship. Whatever might have been the received opinions or construction of the Constitution and laws of the United States as to American citizenship, namely, as to United States citizenship, and, if you please, State citizenship, and as to the status of the negro in this country before the rebellion, whereby the heresy of almost unqualified "State rights" was sought to be asserted, slavery maintained, and the negro made less than human, there can be but one fair and common-sense construction of the organic law, at least in these respects, as it now stands.

PURPOSE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution clearly set forth their purpose. When urging the passage of the civil-rights bill of 1866, in another body, that distinguished jurist, Senator Trumbull, it is said, stated that that measure was to give effect to the fourteenth amendment, which was to secure all persons in the United States practical freedom. Nor are we at a loss to understand what practical freedom is. A distinguished writer says:

> Civil liberty, the great end of all human society and government, is that state in which each individual has the power to pursue his own happiness according to his own views of his interest and the dictates of his conscience, unrestrained, except by equal, just, and impartial laws.—1 Sharswood's Blackstone, 127, note 8.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I assert that in very many, if not in all of the States of the Union, there is no practical freedom, so far as the colored people are concerned; nor would there be any worth talking about if left to the States to regulate; and Congress in the recent past evidently took this view of the matter, as is seen in the unmistakable terms of the amendments referred to, and the laws so far enacted in pursuance thereof.

The fourteenth amendment expressly provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside;" that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," &c.; and each of these amendments concludes with a proviso, that "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

First, sir, there can be no doubt, as we have seen, that these people are citizens of the United States; secondly, that they labor under civil disabilities; thirdly, that they do not enjoy practical freedom, not having "the power to pursue their own happiness," because of these disabilities; and fourthly, that not only has Congress the power, but it is made its solemn duty, in the exercise of its constitutional control over the entire subject, to provide, by "appropriate legislation," such a full and complete remedy as is demanded by the situation.

Mr. Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, speaking for himself, the Chief Justice, and his associates, Justices Swayne and Bradley, in his dissenting opinion in the New Orleans Slaughter-house case, while considering the fourteenth amendment, says:

> A citizen of a State is now only a citizen of the United States residing in that State. The fundamental rights, privileges, and immunities, which belong to him as a free man and a free citizen, now belong to him as a citizen of the United States, and are not dependent upon this citizenship of any State.

Sir, even the opinion of the court in the case just named, and which is said to deny the right of Congress to legislate in this matter, says:

> We hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no State can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, let me say that it must be clear to all that Congress has the power to regulate this matter by law, except to those who construe that instrument for the purpose of evasion; that humanity and justice require that we shall do our whole duty in the premises toward a people who have suffered long years of oppression in this country; a people who have contributed toward our material wealth; who are loyal to our Government, and thousands of whose dead lie alongside of your sons and brothers on many a hard-fought field; whose lives were freely given in defense of the nation's honor and its very life.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, it will not be expected that any member on this or on the other side of the House can discuss the momentous questions involved in this bill in twenty minutes. I desire, however, to consume the time that may be allowed me under the rule, and to ask permission to have printed whatever else I may desire to say to my constituents on this subject. It is not to be expected that any arguments that may be made, or any authorities that may be produced will prove the slightest impediment to the passage of the bill under consideration. It would require an amount of faith rarely found among men in this degenerate age to believe that, even were our lips touched by inspiration and we could speak with the tongues of men and of angels, we could induce the majority of this House to pass from the lips of the southern people the contents of this bitter cup. We know what a tyrant opinion is, and when ill-will, hate, and resentment are added to the consciousness of unresisted power, it tramples under its heel, and ruthlessly tramples, everything that dares to challenge its infallibility. We know the exigencies of its friends and the power that is behind them greater than they, and how utterly futile are all personal convictions of duty or scruples about constitutional right in the presence of impending necessity. It is, therefore, with no hope of success that we interpose our opposition. But we feel that it is due to the people whom we represent, whose feelings are so deeply to be wounded, whose social relations are so greatly to be disturbed, and whose material interests are to be so universally involved in the internal disorders which this measure will produce, that we should enter here our solemn protests against this unauthorized assumption of power. Not only is it due to them, but it is due alike to all the people throughout the entire Union who are interested in the preservation of the Constitution and a just administration of the Government under its authority.

In dealing with the great questions involved, I shall not stoop from the plane of the argument to defend the people of the South against the oft-repeated and threadbare charge of disloyalty to the Government. I will not parade before this House the evidence of her attachment to the principles of constitutional liberty in which her children have been reared. If her accusers are moved by selfish and mercenary motives, nothing I could say would win them from the occupation that fills their pockets with thrift and lifts them into places of official distinction. If they are honest and sincere in their belief, after all the evidence they have had in the last eight years, they will continue fixed in that belief though one rose from the dead to confront them. Time, whose gentle touch heals all wounds, dissipates all distrust, and soothes all passions, will vindicate her against every calumny before the unbiased judgment of mankind. To the bar of that tribunal she is now passing to confront her accusers, face to face. To its impartial decision I remit her, with all that gathers around her honor in the past, and all that pertains to her happiness and peace in the future, invoking Heaven's guidance and protection, while she receives upon her unnerved and unshielded arm the strokes of her open and declared foes on one side, and the false kisses and treacherous stabs of her own recreant children on the other.

In the short time allotted to me I desire to discuss the Constitutional questions presented by the bill, and which have been so ably treated by the venerable and distinguished statesman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.] That the Government of the United States is a government of delegated and limited powers is a doctrine as old as the Constitution itself; that the Congress has no power, save as it is expressed in the Constitution, or arises by necessary implication, has never been denied by any jurist or statesman of any party or of either section. The history of that instrument, and the history of our ancestors for centuries anterior to its formation, are known to us all.

As we ascend the stream of English history we find everywhere the indelible marks of the "irrepressible conflict" between the Crown and the people—between the powerful and the powerless—over those "inalienable rights of men." From the humiliation of King John by his barons at Runnymede to the fall of James II in 1688, the terrible contest was waged between the irrepressible belligerents, everywhere the people asserting and demanding, and the Crown denying and refusing, the recognition of those rights characterized by the people as necessary to their peace and well-being. By every hearth-stone in the land the contest was handed down from sire to son and from generation to generation. Everywhere, from the cliffs of Dover to the mountains of Scotland, the powers and prerogatives of the Crown threw down its gage of battle upon every British threshold and fought against the subjects for their rights and liberties. The whole land wallowed in the blood of civil strife till the fall and flight of James, when the Parliament, in the exercise of the sovereign power of Great Britain, confided the scepter and crown to the keeping of a stranger, who brought stability, prosperity, and peace, and a willing recognition and enforcement of those great and salutary principles of the British constitution. When William of Orange died, the great principles of the Declaration of Rights died with him; and when the house of Hanover ascended the throne, the divine right returned from banishment and ascended the throne with it. And again England was tormented at home and in her colonies by the same usurpations and wrongs that had sown mildew and pestilence upon her people for centuries before. This persistent usurpation of power culminated in these Colonies in open revolt, and again the Declaration of Independence reiterated the old privileges and immunities of British subjects, copied from the Declaration of Rights, which was copied from Magna Charta. And when our fathers successfully ended that contest against George III. for trampling under foot the same great principles, they came together by the cohesive attraction of common interest and kindred affection and laid the foundations of their Government deep, in that great instrument that was intended to protect their lives, liberty, and happiness, and transmit its priceless blessings to their children through all coming time.

They did not have these two great and essential principles of government embodied in their union to be gathered up from history and tradition; but they wrote them in plain, strong, and vigorous English. In the Convention that formed the Constitution the question was debated whether it was necessary to have a bill of rights reserved by the people incorporated in it, and it was not done because the Constitution was federal and had no power except as granted in the instrument itself. And all the great mass of power inherent in them and ungranted by them remained in them. But scarcely had the Convention adjourned when distrust and alarm exhibited themselves everywhere. Were those great principles that had cost their ancestors so much blood, and so many lives, and so many wretched years, now to be endangered? Were these principles for which they had just emerged from a long, terrible, exhaustive struggle to be left again to doubt, to be decided again after long and bloody revolutions by their posterity? These were anxious questions that passed from lip to lip. But from every State the answer came that these rights, these inalienable rights, should be written upon the face of the great charter; and there they are to-day still speaking in all their original vigor and still full of all their original emphasis. These first amendments and some provisions of the Constitution of like import embrace the "privileges and immunities" of citizenship as set forth in article 4, section 2, of the Constitution and in the fourteenth amendment. They are the same "privileges and immunities" that Mr. Jefferson calls in the Declaration of Independence "inalienable rights," "among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." He charges upon the King that—

> He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our Legislature.
> He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.
> For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us.
> For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury.
> For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

The amendments denounce and deny these powers. Troops shall not be quartered upon the people, the trial by jury shall remain inviolate, the right of the people to bear arms shall not be infringed so that if the Government should attempt to put the civil under the heel of the military power that the people should have arms to respond to the argument of arms. When the crown is charged with suspending the local legislatures, and investing the general government with the legislative power of the colonial government, they declare that the powers not granted are reserved to the state.

The fourteenth amendment, under which this bill is attempted to be justified, makes the colored people citizens, and forbids any State from making or enforcing any law that abridges "the privileges and immunities of citizens." To be able to answer the question what those privileges and immunities are, I have referred to our past history, which covers them with a flood of light and shows very plainly what they are and what they are not. Gentlemen have discussed the question as though every right possessed by any one man in any community belonged equally to all others. Such is not the definition of those words when they have been subjected to judicial interpretation. I proceed to show what has been the uniform interpretation of that language as found in the Constitution and the amendment. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read the extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Washington, of the United States circuit court.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and to obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole; the right of a citizen of one State to pass through or to reside in any other State, for the purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State; to take, hold, and dispose of property either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental.

This is one of the earliest cases that reviews that provision of the Constitution, and this language has been universally copied and indorsed by all subsequent opinions of other courts in all the States as far as I have examined. The language is said by some to be happily expressed, and I remember no court that preferred its own language to that of Judge Washington in defining the meaning of those words. They are fundamental or foundation principles that underlie all free government. They are uniform, the same in all lands and latitudes. Chancellor Kent cites and approves the opinion of Judge Washington.

Judge Story, in his commentaries on the Constitution, says:

> The intention of this clause was to confer on them, if one may so say, a general citizenship.

Mr. Justice Curtis, in his dissenting opinion in Sanford vs. Scott, says:

> They are to be citizens of the several States, and as such the privileges and immunities of general citizenship derived from and guaranteed by the Constitution are to be enjoyed by them.

This clause of the Constitution does not confer on the citizens of one State in all other States specific and enumerated privileges and immunities. They are entitled to such as belong to citizenship, but not to such as belong to particular citizens attended by other qualifications. The supreme court of Illinois says that the privileges and immunities mentioned in the Constitution "are uniform throughout the broad and expanded Union." I have said that these words had received a uniform interpretation by the courts, and especially by the courts of the Northern States where they have been confined to the privileges of general citizenship that was uniform everywhere. They have also received legislative interpretation agreeing perfectly with that of the judicial.

At the last term of Congress, on the petition of certain women for the elective franchise, the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House, whose distinguished chairman now sits before me, reported upon the construction of these words, indorsing the definition given by Judge Washington of the privileges and immunities of citizens that are guarded against infraction by the State governments, and they say:

> The clause of the fourteenth amendment, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," does not, in the opinion of the committee, refer to privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States other than those privileges and immunities embraced in the original text of the Constitution, article 4, section 2. The fourteenth amendment, it is believed, did not add to the privileges or immunities before mentioned, but was deemed necessary for their enforcement as an express limitation upon the powers of the States. It had been judicially determined that the first eight articles of amendment of the Constitution were not limitations on the powers of the States, and it was apprehended that the same might be held of the provisions of the second section, fourth article.

It was for the reason given by the committee that the fourteenth amendment was adopted, not to enlarge the privileges and immunities already conferred, but simply to prohibit the States from abridging them as they existed. The chairman of the committee made an able and elaborate minority report, but the majority report was adopted as the decision of the House. The Senate Judiciary Committee reported against the petitioners unanimously, and their report was adopted by the Senate. These words have been again and again subjected to the most learned and critical investigation. They have been construed by the judicial department, by the legislative department, and by the executive department, and the interpretation has always been the same. If there is any virtue in the rule stare decisis, which is often invoked at the bar when the rights of person and property are in question, I hold that all the departments of the Government should stand decided and refuse to go behind the interpretation of these words, so universally acknowledged, and disturb the decision when the rights of millions hang upon it.

From the authority of adjudged cases it is clear that the privileges and immunities mentioned in the fourteenth amendment are only such as are conferred by the Constitution itself as the supreme law over all; that they are fundamental, such as lie beneath the very foundation of the Government; that they are fixed and absolute; and any rights, privileges, and immunities conferred by the State, and without whose grant they could not be enjoyed, are not fundamental, and upon which its structure is built; neither are they uniform, but their differences are as great as the numbers of the States, and as changeable as the laws of the State. The privileges of the Constitution are fixed as the Constitution, which is organic law established to secure fundamental principles. These privileges are, among others, the right to the enjoyment of life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness; the right of peaceable assemblage for all purposes not criminal; freedom of speech, of the press, and of religion; immunity of one's person, house, and papers against unlawful seizure and search; trial by jury when held to answer for crime; to be informed of the accusation, and confronted with the accusers; immunity from excessive bail, excessive fines, and cruel and unusual punishments, and many others, all of which are recognized and guaranteed in the Constitution. But nowhere have the political and civil rights conferred by States upon their own citizens been held as guaranteed by the Constitution, nor have the States been controlled in the manner of conferring them. The privileges conferred by the State may be withdrawn or modified by the State. The State may relieve all males over forty-five years of militia duty to-day, and to-morrow withdraw the immunity, and require the discharge of the duty. The State may relieve all males over fifty years of jury duty, or all white men or all black men, and again withdraw the privilege. Are these fundamental rights? Are they uniform everywhere? Can Congress prevent the States from expanding and contracting these privileges? If a man is fifty years old in one State, and by its laws exempt from jury duty, and moves into another where there is no exemption, is he not subject to jury duty? Then it is not one of the immunities of the Constitution, but an immunity of the State from which he emigrated; that was confined to its own territory, and could not go an ell with the citizen beyond its boundary. But the Constitution, which goes with him as his shield and buckler everywhere, carries with it the privileges and immunities it guarantees.

Has the negro the right under the Constitution to enter the common schools established by the State, and supported by her own means? Then what if the State repeal the law, is not his right abridged? Can Congress prevent it? Is the constitutional right subject to be defeated by the States? Is the right one thing in one State, another in another, and still different in a third? If such are the privileges and immunities of citizenship, no man can tell what they are. Citizenship under the Constitution, with its rights, privileges, and immunities, is the same everywhere, in all the States and Territories, and upon all the seas. As long as the person is a citizen, bearing true faith and allegiance to the Constitution, wherever he goes he carries all the rights and is entitled to all the protection of an American citizen. It is the same in every land and latitude, and the State is as impotent to enlarge it as it is to abridge it; and the Congress is equally impotent to enlarge or diminish any of the privileges conferred by the State on its citizens, and which are created by its own sovereign power. Whatever rights the State confers are subject to its own sovereign pleasure. Whether it shall grant them, how grant them, and what discriminations it shall make in granting them, are questions left entirely to its own discretion.

The States have always exercised the right to fix the status of their citizens, and they will continue to do so. It is their own unquestioned right to make and unmake their constitutions and laws for the government of their people; to regulate the times, places, and manner of electing their officers; to make laws for the suppression and punishment of crime; to levy, assess, and collect their taxes; to build railroads and establish the rules and regulations governing the same; to establish universities, colleges, academies, and common schools, and govern them according to their own pleasure; to prescribe who may be admitted to share their bounty and on what conditions; to prescribe who may practice law and who may not, who may practice medicine and who not, and who shall serve on juries and who not; and it is a gross usurpation of authority for Congress to interfere with the domestic affairs of the States; and it is one of the charges made by the revolted Colonies against Great Britain in 1776.

The supreme court of Illinois decides that the constitutional provision does not interfere with the right of the State to regulate the practice of lawyers; Ohio and Connecticut hold it inapplicable to systems of school education established by the States; Massachusetts that it does not apply to marriage and divorce; New Jersey that it cannot interfere with her right to regulate fishing in her navigable waters. Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court, holds it has no reference to railroads, canals, turnpikes, and ferries. Judge Curtis, in Sanford vs. Scott, says it does not apply to suffrage. All agree that the privileges protected by the Constitution are the privileges reserved by the people in the amendments from the impure and profane hands of Government. These privileges are not confined by State boundaries, but wherever the flag, the symbol of that Government, floats, whether within the jurisdiction of a State or Territory, or upon the high seas, there it carries all the vigor and power of the strong arm of the Government, and protects the citizen in the enjoyment of his "privileges and immunities."

The rule established by Judge Curtis, that the right must be enjoyed under the Federal Constitution, without other authority to constitute the privilege guaranteed by that instrument, which right is general and coextensive with the jurisdiction of the Government, and the rule by Judge Bradley for the privileges of the State, distinguished from the General Government, that they must be held under State law, without which they could not exist, seems to me clearly defines the division between the two jurisdictions. Then, as the Constitution does not create churches, schools, theaters, hotels, and grave-yards in the State, by what authority does Congress claim to regulate these domestic affairs of the State? Whether the white people admit the black people to terms of social equality with them is a question that belongs to the people of the States, to be exercised by them or not in their own sovereign pleasure. And, as Judge McLane says:

> It is a question of taste; and it is a question of taste that Congress cannot regulate.

There are other parts of this bill in the face of the Constitution. It authorizes citizens of the same State to sue each other in the Federal courts. The Constitution only grants Federal courts jurisdiction of suits between citizens of different States. Again, it creates offenses; and defines and punishes them before its courts—a power nowhere to be found in the Constitution. Where is the power found to establish a penal code? Where the power to define felonies and misdemeanors, and punish them? Where is the right to try the citizen at all for these offenses created by the bill? The Constitution levels its interdiction against the States—not the citizens. Its prohibition is against an act of sovereign power—law-making and law-enforcing. It pronounces nothing against the citizen, nor does it in the least abridge his individual action in anything.

I wish now to say a few words about the policy of the bill. What good results does it promise to the black man? And there ought to be some great good to justify an act that invades the rights of the people of the States so flagrantly as this measure does. Is his race to be benefited by constantly using the power of the Federal Government to irritate the feelings of those among whom he lives and from whom he receives his daily bread? Is he benefited when he is thrust into the theater with Federal threats, and protected by awe of Federal power, and sits down among white people while they rise and retire? Is he benefited when he goes to church leaning on the arm of the Federal Government and the people withdraw and leave him to worship alone? Has he gained anything for himself when he enters a white school like a bombshell, and blows up the whole concern? And when he is gathering the folds of his shroud around him does he die more happily because he is going to lay his bones beside the man whom in life he has persecuted and despised? Where is his good to be found? I cannot, searching everywhere, as I hope impartially, through this bill, find a solitary spot that I can place my hand or set my eyes upon that will redound to the good of the black man. But I can see ruinous and fearful mischief in this measure. He cannot force association with an unwilling people. Association will always be governed by the law of taste, and it seems to me very bad taste to seek to force ourselves upon the society of those who repel us.

The great evil this bill has in store for the black man is found in the destruction of the common schools of the South. His children have been enjoying all the benefits of liberal education, paid for by the white people of the South. Notwithstanding their terrible losses by the war, and the grievous burdens of taxation, and the legalized plunder of their State governments in the hands of enemies and strangers, they are still willing to pay the heavy taxes that gives education to all the children. Is not this a very great blessing, conferred upon him by a people whom he is seeking by every effort in his power to wrong? And will he now demand that which to him is utterly impossible at the price of the loss of the education of all the children of his race in the South? In 1870 Texas imposed a tax of some two and a half million of dollars to build school houses alone, and a taxation of over a million a year to sustain her schools. More than one-third of this amount was for the colored children. Is the black man going to forfeit all this for the chase of a phantom that flies from him as fast as he pursues it? I can assure the friends of this bill that they are going to visit a fearful punishment on the children of the colored people of the Southern States, who are guiltless of asking the perpetration of this crime. I would fain even now implore them to pause and think upon the innocent victims. Think of their happy condition now, enjoying the large bounty of a generous people sustaining yearly a heavy tax—none or but little of which is paid by the colored people, for the reason that they have but little property to pay taxes on, not a fault but a misfortune of theirs. The Legislatures of every State where the white people have control will repeal the common-school laws. Who, then, will take him by the hand and lead him to the school-room and pay for his tuition?

Mr. MILLS. I ask to be indulged for a few moments longer.

The SPEAKER. No objection being heard, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman, when the common schools are broken up in all the Southern States, and private schools established, and the children to be educated by those who are able to incur the expense, what is to become of the children of the colored people? Are they to grow up in ignorance and vice? Who is to take the responsibility for this? Much of it will be due to that convention of misguided men who assembled in this city but a few weeks ago to urge its passage. The great mass of the black people of the South do not demand this thing. Some months ago, in the town in which I live the black people had one of their own color teaching their school; but to serve the purposes of political trickery the colored man was removed, and a white man, who was more pliant, was placed in his stead. The colored people refused him entrance into their house, and when he was placed there against their wishes and over their remonstrances, they appeared and laid their complaints before the grand jury of the county, who indicted the common-school law that gave such arbitrary power to the superintendent of education, and the superintendent, both, as nuisances.

We all in the South know that the white people and black before the war belonged to the same churches, often had the same pastors; but now of their own volition they have separated everywhere from the white people, and have their own bishops and ministers and churches and congregations—all separate from the white people. Why is this the case if they are so clamorous for social equality? If they are so anxious to go to the same churches with white people, why did they leave them and abandon the happy association? I believe that nine-tenths of the colored people in Texas, if called upon without intercrence by their leaders, and asked upon their honor if they wanted mixed schools, churches, and social commingling generally with whites, would scout the idea. It is not the masses who are making this demand, but the leaders only, and they do it for partisan purposes. They tell us here that this bill is an expression of the common desire of all the black people in the Southern States. I do not believe a solitary word of it. And when this bill shall have passed, and the schools close, and the children return again to idleness, to be reared in ignorance, pauperism, and crime, and they shall be told that, against the remonstrances of the white people of the South, this bill was passed that closed to them the generous hand that had poured its liberal bounty upon them, they will call down curses upon this bill, and curses upon the madmen who have hung around the Capitol demanding its passage, and curses upon that fell spirit of partisan frenzy that sacrificed them, the unwilling and guiltless victims, to its ungodly lust of power.

Mr. ELLIOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina whether he would not prefer that the House should adjourn; he has an hour, and it is now the usual time for adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was about to make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WALLS. I hope the gentleman will proceed this evening.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the Chair will allow me, I desire to make a suggestion. The bill in regard to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands for purposes of education is in the morning hour. If it will be more agreeable to the House to let this debate go on to-morrow, I have no objection at all to having the morning hour stand over until Wednesday, provided we do not waive our right by that arrangement. Will that be agreeable to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from South Carolina desires to go on to-night, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I am willing that the sense of the House shall be tested on a motion to adjourn; and I yield to the gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I renew the motion to adjourn; we have earned our salaries to-day. [Laughter.]

BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. COTTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1011) in relation to railroad bridges across the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. PELHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted an amendment which he designs offering to the civil-rights bill; which was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 34) authorizing the Second National Bank of Havana, New York, to change its name;

An act (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name; and

An act (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business.

CASE OF THE VIRGINIUS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message of December last I gave reason to expect that when the full and accurate text of the correspondence relating to the steamer Virginius, which had been telegraphed in cipher, should be received, the papers concerning the capture of the vessel, the execution of a part of its passengers and crew, and the restoration of the ship and the survivors, would be transmitted to Congress.

In compliance with the expectations then held out, I now transmit the papers and correspondence on that subject.

On the 26th day of September, 1870, the Virginius was registered in the custom-house at New York as the property of a citizen of the United States, he having first made oath, as required by law, that he was "the true and only owner of the said vessel, and that there was no subject or citizen of any foreign prince or state, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise interested therein."

Having complied with the requisites of the statute in that behalf, she cleared in the usual way for the port of Curaçoa, and on or about the 4th day of October, 1870, sailed for that port.

It is not disputed that she made the voyage according to her clearance, nor that, from that day to this, she has not returned within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. It is also understood that she preserved her American papers, and that, when within foreign ports, she made the practice of putting forth a claim to American nationality; which was recognized by the authorities at such ports.

When, therefore, she left the port of Kingston in October last, under the flag of the United States, she would appear to have had, as against all powers except the United States, the right to fly that flag and to claim its protection as enjoyed by all regularly documented vessels registered as part of our commercial marine.

No state of war existed, conferring upon a maritime power the right to molest and detain upon the high seas a documented vessel, and it cannot be pretended that the Virginius had placed herself without the pale of all law by acts of piracy against the human race.

If her papers were irregular or fraudulent, the offense was one against the laws of the United States, justiciable only in their tribunals.

When, therefore, it became known that the Virginius had been captured on the high seas by a Spanish man-of-war; that the American flag had been hauled down by the captors; that the vessel had been carried to a Spanish port, and that Spanish tribunals were taking jurisdiction over the persons of those found on her, and exercising that jurisdiction upon American citizens, not only in violation of the rules of international law, but in contravention of the provisions of the treaty of 1795, I directed a demand to be made upon Spain for the restoration of the vessel, and for the return of the survivors to the protection of the United States, for a salute to the flag, and for the punishment of the offending parties.

The principles upon which these demands rested could not be seriously questioned; but it was suggested by the Spanish government that there were grave doubts whether the Virginius was entitled to the character given her by her papers; and that therefore it might be proper for the United States, after the surrender of the vessel and the survivors, to dispense with the salute to the flag, should such fact be established to their satisfaction.

This seemed to be reasonable and just. I therefore assented to it, on the assurance that Spain would then declare that no insult to the flag of the United States had been intended.

I also authorized an agreement to be made that, should it be shown to the satisfaction of this Government that the Virginius was improperly bearing the flag, proceedings should be instituted in our courts for the punishment of the offense committed against the United States. On her part Spain undertook to proceed against those who had offended the sovereignty of the United States, or who had violated their treaty rights.

The surrender of the vessel and the survivors to the jurisdiction of the tribunals of the United States was an admission of the principles upon which our demands had been founded. I therefore had no hesitation in agreeing to the arrangement finally made between the two governments; an arrangement which was moderate and just, and calculated to cement the good relations which have so long existed between Spain and the United States.

Under this agreement the Virginius, with the American flag flying, was delivered to the Navy of the United States, at Bahia Honda, in the Island of Cuba, on the 16th ultimo. She was then in an unseaworthy condition. In the passage to New York she encountered one of the most tempestuous of our winter storms. At the risk of their lives the officers and crew placed in charge of her attempted to keep her afloat. Their efforts were unavailing, and she sank off Cape Fear. The prisoners who survived the massacres were surrendered at Santiago de Cuba on the 18th ultimo, and reached the port of New York in safety.

The evidence submitted on the part of Spain to establish the fact that the Virginius at the time of her capture was improperly bearing the flag of the United States is transmitted herewith, together with the opinion of the Attorney-General thereon, and a copy of the note of the Spanish minister, expressing on behalf of his government a disclaimer of an intent of indignity to the flag of the United States.

U. S. GRANT.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, presented the petition of James C. Cooke, of Bridgeport, Connecticut, praying for an extension of his patent for an improvement in the manufacture of webbing; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of Frederick B. Didier, of Hartford, Connecticut, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I also present the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New Haven, in which they say that the great underlying cause of the present commercial distress is found in the inevitable operation of an irredeemable paper currency; that by its operation the industry of the country has been removed from the control of those natural laws by which both commerce and industry must be regulated to be sound and prosperous; that they can see no permanent relief except in the adoption of wise measures for a return to the permanent and universal standard of value. They therefore pray that Congress may take immediate measures to lead the country back to specie payments by providing for the redemption of the legal-tender Treasury notes. I concur in the views of this petition, and move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented two memorials of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and asking for important modifications thereof; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of M. W. Aldrich and many others, merchants, manufacturers, bankers, producers, and business men of the city of Providence, remonstrating against the absolute repeal of the bankrupt act, and asking for such modifications as Congress in its wisdom may see fit to make. The memorialists recognize the importance of a uniform rule throughout the country for the prevention of fraud and preferences among creditors in cases of insolvency, and a like rule by which honest insolvents may be discharged from their debts.

I have seldom had occasion, Mr. President, to present a paper which represents so large and general an expression of the deliberate and well-considered judgment of the intelligent business community which I have the honor in part to represent. It comes from all classes of the varied industry and production and investments which characterize the State. The opinion which it presents is much more nearly unanimous than is often reached upon controverted questions, and this unanimity is the more remarkable, because the bankrupt law was originally received with great doubt and distrust by many of these memorialists, inasmuch as it overrode our insolvent laws, to which, however objectionable they might have been, the business relations of the State had become adapted, and which could not be changed without serious temporary inconvenience, but which, after experience of both systems, they do not wish to restore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Judiciary Committee having reported on the subject, the memorial will be laid on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present a memorial, very numerously signed by merchants of the city of Bangor, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law and asking for a proper modification.

I have received also another memorial from merchants of the same place and for the same purpose; also another memorial signed by legal gentlemen, by Albert W. Paine and other legal gentlemen, of the same place and for the same purpose; also another memorial signed by legal and commercial men from the city of Belfast, in the State of Maine, of the same purport; all of which I move to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported on that subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was not aware that the report had been made. I move, then, that the memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I also hold in my hand a memorial signed by numerous ship-owners in the State of Maine, whose vessels were destroyed in the war by rebel cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, who believe that the principle upon which the Geneva award was founded was applicable alike to their case. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; I believe they have that subject before them.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of John W. Truitt, late of the One hundred and forty-second Indiana Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Augusta H. Chapman, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of citizens of New Bedford, Massachusetts, setting forth that they lost seriously by Confederate cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, and asking compensation under the recent award. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT presented a memorial of the Mechanics' State Council of California, remonstrating against the repeal of the eight-hour law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Samuel C. Cain, praying compensation for cotton alleged to have been seized by the military authorities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of Leonard Rood, of the town of Lyndon, Sheboygan County, Wisconsin, father of William Rood, deceased, late a private in Company E, Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, praying that the charge of desertion be removed from his son; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of W. H. H. Crandall, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Anna Hancock, late Anna Bolinger, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of John Julius Guthrie, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Chatham and Orange Counties, North Carolina, praying that those counties be transferred from the western to the eastern judicial district of North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented additional papers in the case of R. H. Jones, executor of Wesley Jones, late United States marshal of North Carolina, praying payment of a balance due said Wesley Jones for taking the census of 1860; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I have sundry petitions to present on the subject of the bankrupt law; the first one, numerously signed by merchants of the city of New York, expressing the fear that Congress has not rightly comprehended the sentiment of the commercial classes touching the bankrupt law, and asking that the Senate may so direct its proceedings that that class of the public may be heard, and indicating clearly opposition to the repeal of the law.

I have another petition, signed by many leading commercial men and firms of the city of New York, to the like effect. Also, a petition, very numerously signed in Brooklyn, New York, stating the belief that the bankrupt law requires amendment, and considerable amendment, but remonstrating against its repeal. I move that all these petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN presented the petiton of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, West Virginia, praying relief and compensation for their church building at that place, taken and occupied by, and converted to the use of, the United States Army, under proper orders, during the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of A. J. Tynes, of Tennessee, praying compensation for the value of buildings destroyed by military order during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of F. E. Stewart, administratrix of Michael S. Stewart, of Tennessee, praying compensation for wood cut under a contract for the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the memorial of Audley W. Gazzan, a citizen of New York, protesting against the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move that Senate bill No. 30 be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 30) to provide for free banking, to secure an elastic currency, to appreciate national obligations, and to reach specie payments without commercial embarrassment, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. COLLECTION OF INTERNAL REVENUE BY STAMPS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have been directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] instructing the committee "to consider the expediency of reducing the national expenditure by abolishing the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue and other offices under him, and forthwith providing by law for the collection of all internal taxes by the sale and use of stamps, the presence of stamps on articles being evidence that they had paid the tax, and the absence of stamps that they had not paid the tax, and taxed articles without stamps being seizable by any officer and forfeitable in any United States court, the law to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury; and to consider the extent of saving and economy by such change." I am directed to report the same adversely, and ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. President, I will say that until the millennium arrives we cannot expect to have our taxes voluntarily paid to the extent that they ought to be in order to sustain the Government. Unquestionably the amount of taxes collected would be reduced by this proposition nearly or quite 50 per cent.; and while we might undoubtedly reduce the expenses of collecting them almost entirely, we should lose inevitably at least one-half of the taxes by abolishing the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue. At the present time most of our taxes are received from tobacco and spirits. These taxes require the constant vigilance of the Department here and of its officers all over the country. If they were to be abolished of course we should have any amount of fraud and illicit distillation. Under present circumstances, it is fair to say that the amount of the reduction in the expenses of collecting the internal revenue has not been as great as was anticipated, nor perhaps as great as it should have been; but I hope that for the coming year the excellent officer in charge of that Department will very largely and more vigorously reduce the expenses of collecting the revenue throughout the country, as I think he ought to do. The expenses in many districts, although the aggregate has been reduced, are yet far too large.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, what is the condition of the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the resolution offered by the Senator, and reported adversely by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. My attention was called to the Senator's remarks after he rose. I should like to know of the Senator whether the committee has considered the economy incident to the proposed change. The suggestion was that the taxes on spirits and tobacco should be by stamps—stamps to be sold at specified places throughout the country. The Senator sees at once the economy of such a change, and how it would supersede a large army of office-holders. I am unaware from what the Senator said if the point has been considered by the committee; or, at least, if their attention has been specially called to it. To my mind, and according to the information I have obtained, there is in this proposition an opportunity of practical economy. Obviously, by adopting the system of stamps, we may supersede many present office-holders. That may not be agreeable to everybody, but it will be consistent with economy, which all profess and some desire.

I fear that my friend has acted hastily. I fear that he has not considered how remedial a measure it is. Unless I am misinformed by those whose duty it is to be familiar with the question the proposition that I have presented is practical; it may be carried into operation; and it will produce a serious saving to the Treasury.

Therefore, I regret the report of the committee, and I wish that it had been in a written form that the country might have the benefit of its inquiry. As it is now we have nothing but the vague expressions of my excellent friend, to whom I always listen with the greatest respect, but who on this occasion—he will pardon me—did seem to fail in his usual practical sense, and also in his clearness of expression.

I do not wish to oppose the conclusion of the Senate. If there is a real desire to put this question out of the way by indefinite postponement; to say to the country, "No economy is to be expected in this quarter, no saving by cutting off these officers, no reduction by an economical use of stamps;" if the Senate is prepared to make such answer to the country now, I shall submit; but on the information that I have, I think they will act hastily. I have done my duty in presenting the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I do not think the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has studied the practical working of the internal-revenue laws sufficiently to perceive the wreck that he would make in the revenue if his proposition were to be carried into effect. At the present time we collect at least 95 per cent. of all the taxes that ought to be collected upon the distillation of spirits. The men who are engaged in this operation, we know from past experience, are just as ready to pay only 10 per cent., 20 per cent., 30 per cent., or 40 per cent., as 95; and it is only through the vigilance of all the officers and the energy of the Department throughout the whole country that we have been able to reach this fortunate result, this large percentage, on so difficult a subject from which to obtain a just amount of revenue.

For instance, the wholesale merchant must be tracked on this subject; he must not be allowed to sell more spirits than those upon which the duties have been paid. His books, therefore, must be kept, and properly kept, so that they may be examined by the proper officer. Only recently there was a vinegar establishment seized in New York that had been in operation for two months, making vinegar from spirits. They had concealed artfully their distillery in the premises and reached upper stories in it by which spirits were conveyed secretly, and they were not discovered until it was ascertained that they were sending out much larger quantities of vinegar than they had previously paid taxes on the spirits from which the vinegar was manufactured. All this has to be under the charge of an officer here. It would make no difference in the expense by transferring it to the Secretary of the Treasury. He would have to have the same number of officers here that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has in order to conduct this vast and very complicated business.

And, Mr. President, have we not had experience enough, in relation to the income tax, in reference to leaving any tax voluntarily with the consciences of individuals as to how much they would pay? Any man that has studied the subject in relation to the income tax knows that we did not collect certainly over 60 per cent. of what ought to have been collected under that law; and yet we had affidavit after affidavit from men all over the country that they had paid all that they ought to have paid. Now the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to leave the tax on whisky, tobacco, and any other taxes, throughout the country, to the consciences of men, and to allow them to put on such stamps as they may see fit and think proper. Of course, there would be a saving in all the paraphernalia of the Internal Revenue Office. We should, perhaps, save three or four millions in expenditures for the personnel of the office, and we would lose fifty millions of revenue. That is just the result, in my judgment, that would be brought about by the proposition proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the resolution be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will add that the report of the committee was unanimous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate postpone the resolution indefinitely?

The motion was agreed to.

PRESENT FROM THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA TO EDWARD YOUNG.

Mr. CAMERON. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia, to report it back without amendment; and, as I suppose there can be no opposition to it, I ask to have it acted upon at once. It cannot take more than a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The preamble states that His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia has been pleased to confer upon each of the official delegates of the United States to the international statistical congress at Saint Petersburg a diamond ring as a souvenir of that reunion; and as one of those delegates, Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, holds an office of profit and trust under the United States, the joint resolution gives the consent of Congress to Edward Young to accept from the Emperor of Russia the present above mentioned.

Mr. SUMNER. I will make one remark upon that resolution. It seems to me that we are about to depart from the rule thus far laid down; it will be for the Senate to consider whether wisely or not. The practice, as I understand, has been to allow any officer to accept a present or mark of honor from a foreign government in consideration of generous or humane services rendered on the ocean or elsewhere, from which some subject of that government has derived safety or help. Thus far I think it has been deemed fit to limit the acceptance of such presents to these cases. The heart of every man goes forth in honor of any service of humanity; and if a foreign government chooses to recognize it, let the officer who has rendered the service wear the honor nobly and beautifully through life. I know not if there be not some other case which may justly claim our regard. But I am sure that we ought to be cautious in a concession plainly inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions.

But when you allow a person in the diplomatic service, or otherwise employed abroad, and representing our Republic, to receive insignia of honor or other gift from a foreign government, the case is materially different. For one, sir, I shrink from allowing the representatives of our country abroad to enter into the discreditable scramble which prevails in Europe for recognition from princes. It seems to me our course should be austere. We should say to all who go abroad with the commission of the Republic, "Go not into rivalry with Europeans for crosses and rings from emperors or kings; serve your country well and your country will reward you; but look for nothing from any foreign power." Such has been the rule in times past, and I think it a very doubtful policy for the Senate now to depart from it.

This may seem a small affair; but if you allow this office-holder, who has rendered no signal service to humanity, whose life has been in no peril, who has saved no life, who has not the title to wear the fairest crown of ancient Rome—that for saving the life of a citizen—who has done nothing directly for others—if you allow him to receive this ring, where will you stop? Will not one of your ministers, one of your secretaries, one of your consuls, or somebody else in your service, apply for a similar indulgence? Will not our agents be inspired to watch the footsteps of princes or be the courtiers of foreign power? The simple citizen is under no constraint; but whoso bears title or office from the Republic must remember always that he is a republican.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I agree fully in many of the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts; but I think this a case distinct from those of which he has spoken. Here were a number of men appointed on a commission of a peculiar nature to go to Russia. There were eight or ten of them. While there they rendered great service to the cause of science throughout the world, so as to attract the attention of the Emperor of Russia, and he was desirous of paying them some compliment. He gave them each a small diamond ring, worth but a trifle, merely as a souvenir of his great respect for their merits. All of them are allowed to receive the present because they are private citizens, except this one gentleman, who happens to be an officer in the civil service of the United States.

Here is a man who has devoted his whole life to abstruse studies, a simple-minded student who has rendered that sort of service to the country and the world which few men can render, because they are not willing to devote their whole minds to that which gives no ornament to themselves and does them no honor except with a few individuals who know how much labor and time they give to the pursuit of their favorite studies. This man will think himself wronged if he alone cannot accept this compliment when he perhaps did more to make the commission respectable and useful than any gentleman who was there.

I would agree, with the Senator from Massachusetts, that a minister, an embassador, or anybody belonging to our consular service, would disgrace himself if he did accept a present from a potentate abroad; and yet I know a man, whose name I am not willing to mention just now, who is bragging all over the country that he has a costly portrait of one of the emperors of the world, presented to him, costing a very large sum of money; and he has been showing it all around the country as an evidence of his own merit. That I am opposed to. But to say that this little bit of a ring—not of as much value as a gold-headed cane would be, because that would help to prop him up in his old days—cannot be received by this simple-minded man, I think would be cruel.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word on this resolution. The reasons that influenced the framers of the Constitution in putting in it the inhibition which it contains against any officer of the Government receiving any present from any foreign prince or potentate, are well known. It was the custom when the Constitution was formed, and had been for a long time before, and has been since, for even the ministers of a foreign country to receive presents from the country to which they were accredited; and at that time very few treaties were formed where presents were not bestowed upon those who negotiated them. The framers of the Constitution saw fit not only to forbid that, but to forbid any officer of the United States from receiving any present from any foreign potentate or prince without the consent of Congress.

Now it seems to me, as has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts, that we ought to have some principle on which we go in granting this assent. If we grant it whenever it is applied for, the provision of the Constitution amounts to nothing. If we grant it in one instance that stands on no particular principle, it is very difficult to refuse it in another instance; for it is not only then apparently an injustice to the individual who asks for relief, but it seems to be some discourtesy to the foreign princes that bestow the gift. I think, therefore, that we ought to have some principle upon which we go in giving this assent, and I can conceive of none better than that suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. In cases where our officers or citizens have risked their own lives on the high seas in saving the lives and property of the subjects of a foreign prince, and he has recognized that by offering to bestow upon them some gift, we have a plain simple rule, and we have always granted that consent; and for the present at least, I think we had better confine ourselves to such cases. I therefore, with the most perfect respect for the gentleman to whom this ring is offered, and for the reasons that have been expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, feel compelled to vote against the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, "and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them"—namely, the United States—"shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state." In acting under that provision of the Constitution, operating upon no one save only persons holding offices of emolument or trust, the Senator from Ohio says we ought to have some principle. I agree with him, and in deference to the principle which I think we ought to have, I shall vote for this resolution. That principle I conceive will be sufficiently stated thus: It was, for abundant reasons at the time, and reasons certain to continue as long as human nature is human and men are made of clay, thought unwise that men representing public trusts under the United States should be permitted, of their own accord merely, secretly, without any notice or knowledge on the part of their country or the public, to accept benefits, gifts, presents, compliments from the representatives of foreign nations; and, therefore, it was provided that such gifts should be accepted only when their proposed acceptance was made known to Congress, and thus of course made publicly known and acquiesced in by the representatives of the nation, by the American people in Congress assembled. That I understand to be the principle which is to be observed in deferring to this clause of the Constitution—that it shall be done only in those cases with which Congress is acquainted, and the circumstances of which lead Congress to consent.

Mr. President, I am going to say only a word about this very unimportant case, particularly as compared with many others which, even since my short sojourn in this body, have gone unchallenged here; but I remark, that if there be one instance as harmless as any other that suggests itself to me, it must be the case of a delegate to a scientific congress or conclave of men engaged in the pursuit of statistical information—about as dry and abstract athing as could well be conceived of. If, therefore, under this provision of the Constitution, when this gentleman makes known his circumstances, we cannot allow him, as a man of science who participated momentarily in an occasion of science, to accept a compliment from the sovereign within whose realm that meeting took place, I submit that there can scarcely be found an instance in which this clause of the Constitution ought to be acted upon at all. If not in this case, I can think of none; and if a refusal would be proper in this case, then I think the Constitution should be held to amount to a total prohibition in all cases whatever.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it occurs to me that the proper way of considering this case is to consider whether or not courtesies should be encouraged between our envoys, civil or diplomatic, and the rulers of the countries to which they are accredited. It is perfectly plain that the Constitution has expressly allowed gifts of this kind, or gifts or emoluments of any kind, to be received by United States officials when the consent of Congress shall have been obtained. The question, therefore, in each case will be; whether it is a proper occasion for permitting the reception of the gift; and I do not see how anything like a general principle can be established in relation to such facts. Each case must stand upon its own merits. If the Congress of the United States have reason to believe that the official to whom a gift is sought to be presented has been governed in the execution of his duty, been swayed in the exercise of his high discretion, by gifts of any kind or by influences which the American people would suspect and reject, then the consent of Congress should be most emphatically withheld.

But there are many occasions in which a kindly courtesy will long remain to gratify not only its recipient, but his children and his fellow countrymen. I can well imagine how, in a duty so entirely abstracted from personal interest as that in which this gentleman with others has been concerned, it would be a most gracious ending of a dry business task that the affair should be marked by some souvenir of kindness and respect. For that reason, sir, conceiving that the full power is given to this gentleman, when authorized by the consent of Congress, to receive this present—believing it to be entirely innocent, a matter of lawful and honorable compliment to him—I shall vote with pleasure that he may be permitted to receive it on this occasion.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has said almost identically what I wished to say when I rose at the time he did. I conceive myself that if the Constitution had intended to say that no employé of the United States should receive a present from a foreign prince except in the identical case of a seaman who should peril his life to rescue a foreign citizen, the Constitution would have said so. It was as easy for the makers of the Constitution to define the precise case in which a present might be given and received as it is for us to-day to define that case; and inasmuch as the Constitution did not define the case, I conclude with the Senator from Delaware that it meant to do what by the terms employed it did do—leave it, not to the individual employé, but to the Congress of the United States to say, acting upon each case as it arose, whether or not that was a proper case in which the individual might receive the present, intending to guard, as I suppose, the public service against undue foreign influence.

And now, sir, I would not have said a word if I felt that the only consequence of this vote was to determine whether Mr. Edward Young should receive a ring or not; but I think there is a much greater question involved in the vote, and it is this: whether the American Congress will say to the Emperor of Russia that in his attempt to compliment a scientific savan he has offended the United States, or done a wrong, or made a movement toward a wrong to our service. If we say that Mr. Young shall not receive that present, that it is improper for him to receive that ring, we do directly say, as it seems to me, that it was improper for the Emperor to tender the ring. If it was proper for him to proffer it, it was proper for the individual to receive it. I hope we shall not reach such a conclusion as that, or make such a declaration as that. No one will contend that the service of the United States is injured by the fact of offering or the fact of receiving that small gift.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I concur entirely with the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Delaware, and will only remark in addition, that the office of commissioner to this statistical congress which Dr. Young filled, if it were an office at all, has long since expired; the duties have been discharged; and therefore the case is not within the spirit of the prohibition of the Constitution. He cannot be influenced in the discharge of his duties by this present.

But I rose more particularly to call attention to a precedent, which has been set within the last two years, of permitting persons to whom presents of this kind are offered in consideration of their scientific services or distinction to receive them by the passage of a resolution in the Senate. I will read it, and certainly if there could be no objection made to that resolution, (and I do not remember who introduced it,) there ought to be none to the case now before us. A joint resolution approved April 20, 1871, reads thus:

That the consent of Congress is hereby given to Professor Joseph Henry, secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to accept the title and regalia of a commander of the Royal Norwegian Order of St. Olaf, conferred upon him for his distinguished scientific service and character by the King of Sweden and Norway, grand master of said order.

Certainly, Mr. President, if in the face of the constitutional inhibition that we shall not confer a title of nobility we can authorize such a distinction as this to be conferred on a scientific individual, we ought not to stumble at the little gold ring that is proffered to this humble, laborious, but yet very worthy and deserving statistician, Dr. Young.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the salary bill, so called, on which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Mr. STEWART. I had about concluded what I wished to say when the Senate adjourned yesterday; and on further reflection I am only confirmed in what I then said, that there is no constitutional objection to any discrimination Congress may see fit to make in compensation between members; in fact it might name the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Pennsylvania by name, and say that they should receive no compensation, and I should like to know by what means they could enforce the payment of any compensation or challenge the constitutionality of the law?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator says that it is competent for Congress by law to say that particular Senators shall receive no compensation. The Constitution says:

> The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

I want to know if that does not impose upon Congress the duty of providing by law a compensation?

Mr. MORTON. It does not require us to take it, though.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I do not think it does.

Mr. STEWART. You might fix one cent of compensation. There is no limit to any law that might be passed upon the subject. The Supreme Court have expressly decided that Congress has the power to impair the obligation of contracts, although it is a power not to be exercised in ordinary cases. Though they deprecate the exercise of it, still they say Congress has power to impair the obligation of contracts. The prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts only operates on the State Legislatures, not on Congress. I have no doubt, then, about the power to make discriminations. That question is suggested by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] by his amendment, which, no doubt, is a discrimination, because these are monthly payments, and it goes on the theory that the money we have received we ought not to have, and that, consequently, there should be a deduction from our future compensation. It is on that theory that the money allowed us by this increased compensation ought not to have been paid, that it was wrong to pay it, and wrong to receive it, under this law. If that be the case, if it was wrong to receive it since the 4th of March, 1873, certainly it was wrong to have received it since the 4th of March, 1871; and, surely, if the amendment is right in principle, it does not go far enough, and there is no constitutional difficulty in doing exact justice, so far as the members of the present Congress are concerned, if it is proper to do it at all, and if justice has not been done by the law. So I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment, to substitute for the amendment the following:

> Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received any increased compensation under the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall in the aggregate make their compensation equal to $5,000 per annum for each Congress since the 4th of March, 1871, exclusive of mileage allowances.

Mr. PRATT. Will the Senator withdraw his amendment for a moment for the purpose of allowing me to perfect the amendment which I offered yesterday? I wish to change its phraseology so as to meet the scruple of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I think I do it in the paper which I have drawn up, which I will now read, as an amendment to the amendment which I offered yesterday.

Mr. STEWART. I will hear the reading of it; I do not know that I shall give way to it.

Mr. PRATT. It is as follows:

> And provided further, That in all cases where any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the Forty-third Congress shall not have actually drawn the full rate of compensation provided by the said act since the 4th day of March, 1873, such sums so undrawn and in excess of the rate of compensation of $5,000 per year herein provided, shall be covered into the Treasury by the disbursing officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

I beg leave to inquire of my friend from Ohio whether this meets his scruple?

Mr. STEWART. I object to this proceeding. I cannot give way for that. I want a direct vote on the plain proposition I have offered. If any portion of the increased compensation is a steal, the whole of it is. If it be the sense of the Senate that any portion of it has been stolen it has all been stolen. I do not believe any of it has been stolen, but I will not vote for a divided proposition; I want it all in. I will read my amendment again——

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to make a point of order, that the amendment now offered is not in order for the reason that there are two amendments already pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know what two amendments are pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee reports one amendment and the Senator from Indiana has moved to amend that. His amendment is an amendment to an amendment, and a further amendment is not now in order.

Mr. STEWART. If I am out of order in offering it now, there will be a time when we shall have a chance of voting as to whether we will divide this steal or not.

Mr. LOGAN. What do you mean by "steal?"

Mr. STEWART. I say if we have got to give any of this money back, it is on the ground that it is not lawfully and properly ours. Then it must be a steal; but you may call it embezzlement, or any gentlemanly name you can get. If any part of this money in our pockets does not belong to us, if any portion of the increase does not belong to us, none of it belongs to us, and there is no use in dividing the thing. If under this law any Senator or Member has got money that he ought to give back a part of, he ought to give it all back. Is not that right? The theory upon which we vote to give back is that we took it unlawfully. If we took part of it unlawfully, we took it all unlawfully; and there has been more complaint about the back pay that was taken for services prior to March 3, 1873, than there has been about the increased pay subsequent to that period. The most odious part of it was that taken for services prior to March 3, 1873. The back pay was what made this law odious in the estimation of the people; and to say that what we have received since then was ill-gotten gain and what we received previous to that period is all right, is illogical and unworthy of this Senate. I do not want to be placed in any such position. I propose to amend this amendment so that it shall cover the whole case, and then test the sense of the Senate upon the question of whether the whole of this is ill-gotten gain or not.

In moving this amendment I do not retract what I said last spring when the subject was under consideration, and what I said yesterday, that I do not believe $7,500 a year is an unreasonable compensation for members of Congress. I do not believe a less compensation is in accordance with our duties or with the public good. I do believe that the public good requires that every member of each House shall be placed in an independent and respectable position while he administers the great duties of his office here at Washington. I believe he should be independent of harassing board-bills for his family. I believe he should be placed in a position where his family can entertain reasonably, modestly, quietly, their friends when they call upon them, in rooms suitable for the purpose, that they shall not constantly be humiliated in being brought in contact with the ordinary world. Seventy-five hundred dollars a year is no extravagant sum for a quiet, modest family to live upon in any city of the Union; and every citizen who is at all conversant with such matters, or whose opinion is at all valuable, must know that fact. It cannot be possible that citizens knowing that fact, knowing it as well as they do, can wish to put us on a lower salary. I have never met one that has not admitted it to me in conversation. I have talked with hundreds of people; I have put the simple question to them, "Do you believe a gentleman with his family can live decently in any city of this Union on less than $7,500 a year, and entertain his friends as a representative must when they call upon him, and have a room to receive them in; do you believe it can be done for less money than that?" and the answer has been invariably from gentlemen with whom I have conversed, "No." That is my own judgment. I am willing to vote for that sum. I believe, notwithstanding all that has been said, that that is not an unreasonable amount; but I say if the Senate think otherwise let them reduce the amount. If they think it was so outrageous to fix our pay at that sum, that the money thus taken was ill-gotten gain, and should be disgorged, then I say disgorge it all; disgorge the back pay as well as the pay received subsequent to March 3, 1873. If it be the judgment of the two Houses of Congress that it was ill-gotten gain, then I will disgorge it in obedience to that judgment—in obedience to the judgment of a majority; but let the judgment of the majority be squarely recorded upon this question, and it is fair that it should be now, since there has been so much said, and not do it by halves.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, this is one of those questions involving a good deal of personal delicacy, necessarily, from the very character of the subject itself, and it is one of those questions in the present attitude of affairs which, if it is a thing to be done, it is well, in my judgment, that it should be done quickly.

That the measure of the Forty-second Congress, known as the salary provision, came to incur the popular displeasure is undeniable, and that a sentiment of dissatisfaction found expression in a demand for repeal is probably equally true.

It is unimportant to inquire into the causes or circumstances which may have influenced this popular judgment, whether based upon an intelligent apprehension of the whole subject, or influenced by partial or incomplete views, and how much may be attributable to exaggerated and distorted representations through popular channels.

The fact conceded, upon a question of so much personal embarrassment as necessarily inheres in the exercise of the conferred power of ascertaining, by law, the compensation of its members, Congress, as it prizes its usefulness, can have no controversy with its constituency. Nor is it material to inquire as to the circumstances, motives, or other considerations which may have influenced the Forty-second Congress and prompted the measure. They were, doubtless, various, depending upon convictions of its justice or injustice, expediency or inexpediency. A curious public have not been left in the dark as to the action of Senators; and all interested may learn from the record the true relations of each to the subject-matter.

For myself, I did not think the measure politic, although I am free to say I do not think the compensation to members as adjusted, unjust for excess.

It was clearly competent for the Forty-second Congress to determine the current compensation of its members, both on authority and usage. It is equally competent for the Forty-third Congress to ascertain and determine its compensation, and neither is open to the revision of any other department of the Government.

A question has arisen as to what the public judgment really is upon the legislation in question—whether partial or general, whether it included the entire salary increase or related to that of members of Congress only, and was alike applicable to the current or "back pay" of the Forty-second Congress and the prospective increase. At the outset objection was taken to what was called "back pay," while prospective increase seemed not to be objectionable, or was at most regarded as tolerable. Upon reflection, distinctions between current and prospective increase, either on authority, usage, logic, or morality, seemed to become less apparent and were abandoned as untenable, and finally the public sense found expression in a demand for repeal.

This I am disposed to regard as the public judgment.

It is not the first time in its history that Congress has found itself at variance with its constituency upon the question of its compensation, a subject upon which the public has always been especially sensitive, arising, doubtless, from the peculiarity and amplitude of the constitutional provision. It was in the Constitutional Convention seen to be a matter of great delicacy and difficulty. It contravened the American habit of thought of stipulated compensation. Here it was left exclusively to the employed, a method in itself a constant challenge to criticism and a provocation to complaint.

So has been its history at each attempt of Congress to adjust its compensation, not more apparently on account of the amount of compensation than the fact of exercising such authority at all; as in 1816 when complaints were general and denunciations unqualified, Congress having adjusted its compensation at $1,500.

Between the judgment of Congress as to what is adequate compensation for services and charges incident to public service, and the popular questioning as to the method of ascertaining it, and whether a different rule should not obtain in the case of the legislator from that applied to other occupations, there is ample ground for contrariety of opinion and dissent, mutual misconceptions and dissatisfaction.

Mr. President, the question of the salaries was an entirety. It was a question of compensation. There never was any other question in it which should touch any man's judgment or conscience except this: Was it an adequate or an inadequate compensation? In other words, was it in excess of a reasonable compensation? If it was it applied equally to "back pay," the current pay, and the prospective pay. And no one who believes that it was in excess can take and hold conscientiously, in my judgment, either the back pay or the prospective pay.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the repeal, pure and simple.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CONKLING. What is that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to insert at the end of line 10 of the amendment of the committee the following:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per year, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall, in the aggregate, make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year, exclusive of mileage allowances.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that the vote will be taken upon this amendment at once, as also upon all other amendments that may be offered, though I trust none will be offered, and that we shall get to a vote on the bill in a very short time. Having been absent yesterday, however, necessarily, upon business connected with another committee, as the Chair knows officially, when some questions were made with reference to the bill, I deem it proper to say one word as I am now in my place, lest my absence might be misconstrued.

Upon this measure, as upon all others, while I have a seat upon this floor I propose, as far as I can, to look to practical results. In other words, I think a vast deal more of a practical certainty than I do of theoretical perfection. I know that we may remain here and discuss this and other questions day after day, whereas if we would come down to the real question before us, and decide it on the judgment of each Senator, we should be more likely to reach such practical results as would be beneficial to the country as well as to ourselves.

So far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana is concerned, if it stood alone and aside from its effect on this bill, I certainly am not prepared to say that I should oppose it. I think my course upon this question last session, as well as this, is sufficient to indicate how I would stand upon the general proposition. In other words, I think that in justice and in right, and in view of all the considerations that obtain, it is but proper that this bill, so far as Senators and members are concerned, should relate back to the 4th of March last. But as I have already said, while that is my opinion I nevertheless am as well of the opinion that if this amendment shall be carried, it perhaps will result in the defeat of the bill—if not here, that it perhaps may fall as between the two Houses.

Further, I go upon the rule that if I cannot accomplish all that I would desire in a given case I will accomplish as much as possible in the direction that is good. I think, therefore, it is unfortunate that my friend should have offered this amendment, for I think it tends to complicate this question and to lead us off on an issue that we need not get upon if the friends of the bill will all unite in this view of the case, as I think they should.

Allow me to say further that if left to myself I am in favor of a square repeal, just a simple repeal of so much of the act of March 3, 1873, as relates to salaries—no more, no less—with no distinction between officers, between members of Congress, or any persons so far as we can reach them under the Constitution. I say that is my preference; that is what I would prefer to do; and if such a bill shall be presented, I shall vote for that in preference to any other; but if that cannot be done, and as the committee has reported the bill as it now stands, I prefer to stand by the bill rather than to encumber it and burden it with amendments that I think must possibly and in all probability result in its defeat. I say this to show where I stand upon the general question. I prefer a square repeal of the old law. I prefer that for many reasons that I shall not enter into at this time. I know that, so far as we are concerned here, there are many reasons that justly operate upon the minds of Senators which did not operate last spring when we passed the law; and that many of our good friends who voted for it last session can now just as consistently and just as properly vote for its repeal.

Mr. President, I beg pardon for having said so much, for my purpose was not to take up time on this bill, preferring much that we vote and get it out of the way, because it seems to me that for the country and for ourselves it were better that we dispose of this very speedily than to take up time here by discussion. Hence I beg pardon for having said so much. I have only said it to put myself right, inasmuch as I was absent yesterday, and also that I might set myself right upon the pending amendment, lest any one might suppose, voting against it as I shall for the reason I have stated, that I was unfriendly to the amendment upon principle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I am opposed to this amendment, and wish to include that in the remarks I desire to submit.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Texas wishes to speak to the bill and let the vote be taken on the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Ohio appeals to the Senator from Texas to allow the vote to be taken upon this amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, I do not. I misunderstood the Senator from Texas. I understood him to say that he desired to vote on the amendment and speak to the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that this amendment is a somewhat important thing in this proceeding; and if the Senator from Texas is going to discuss the bill, I shall be glad, for one, to hear him discuss it before we vote on the amendment. I do not wish to take the floor from him, but, if the vote is to be taken now, I want to ask a question of the Chair, and perhaps of the Senator who moved the amendment, before I vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. STEWART. Before that is done I want to appeal to the Senator from Indiana to allow my amendment to be voted upon. I ask him to waive the question of order, to let the report of the committee be regarded as the original bill, so as to allow my amendment to be voted on. Let us test the question whether the back pay shall be returned or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, and it would not now be in order for him to consent to the proposed change.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I was objecting, in my slow way. I may not have been understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I regret upon this occasion that I am unprepared in almost every sense of the word to discuss this subject. I have no written speech. I had not expected to be called upon to cast my vote at so early a day; but I discover that my friends upon the right are remarkably anxious to dispose of this subject. They have arrived at the conclusion that really there is nothing to discuss, that we have a plain duty prescribed which the country expects us to perform, and that without ceremony. Now, sir, I for my part have not arrived at the conclusion that I will come forward and put in a plea of guilty to the indictment preferred here. By no means, sir. I am guilty, if there is guilt pertaining to any member of this Senate who advocated the passage of the bill now in question. I did it, and I did it from the purest motives. My motives were pure. I thought we had a right to enact the law; and I thought it was due to the Representatives in Congress that we should do so. I thought that $7,500 a year was not too much; indeed I remarked upon that occasion that I was not satisfied with $7,500; that it ought to have been $10,000. I have seen nothing since that day to cause me to arrive at a different conclusion.

Now, I witness here that which I would be proud to see upon different occasions. Here are a number of Senators whom I love personally. I love them for their great ability; I love them, if you please, in almost every sense of the word; but they admonish me of the words of the poet, who wrote long since—

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest—

I will not say for them what the poet said—

> may return.

No, I will not call them so. They are acting from pure motives. But, after standing up side by side with me at a rather late hour of the night, on the 3d of March last, in voting for the bill that came in from the House, they have looked at this matter maturely since, and they have arrived at the conclusion that it is proper to return the money they have received. I have not arrived at that conclusion. I find on my table to-day an official report of those Senators who have returned the increased pay. I did not know who they were previous to that report. It was not my business to know; and whatever they had done they had a perfect right to do. I have no right to say even that they erred. I ask simply the same justice for myself that I extend to them. I was one of those that are not noticed here, because I had not drawn mine. But as epidemics rage through cities and frequently reach the interior, I became yesterday a little alarmed, and, thinking this had become so perfectly epidemic, having spread all through the Union—for the various Senators that have refunded live in different directions over this mighty country—I said to myself, "I do not know what may come over my dreams;" and to make perfectly sure of it, and make it all right, this morning I went and called for mine, and I have got a few thousand-dollar bills, and some hundreds, and this, that, and the other. Here they are, [exhibiting several United States notes;] this is my pay, and I am going to fight for it to the last. [Laughter.] I have not stolen that money. I have done nothing that preys upon my conscience in voting for it. I have endeavored to earn it, and I should like to know the power under the Constitution, or from whatever source it may come, that can now divest me of it. There it is.

I am not one of those who expect at an early day to be drafted to take a seat in the White House. Therefore there is no scruple with me upon that branch of the subject; no such influence operates on me; and the returning the money will not elect any man to the presidency—you may be easy on that subject. I am gratified to say further that the Legislature of Texas was in session when I cast this vote. I, directly after leaving the Senate Chamber here, paid my respects to that Legislature. I was kindly received in every sense of the word. That Legislature did not condemn my colleague in this body, nor my colleagues in the other House, nor myself, for having cast that vote. Therefore I again feel tolerably easy on that branch of the subject.

But, Mr. President, I am admonished on this occasion that I should be brief. It is possible that I ought to be; but I am not in the habit of addressing the Senate very frequently. I differ with my friends on that point. I have no hesitancy in saying that this matter ought not to be disposed of very readily; I think it ought to be canvassed well and studiously. It is a grave question. I doubt whether one more grave will be presented during this session, though, I take it, it will be a long one.

Sir, the demagogues of the country have preferred this indictment against us, and many of my friends around me seem to have become alarmed at it. All that I said in their behalf at the outset was sincere. I can only reiterate it again; but they are human; they are just what the human family was thousands of years ago. Various influences have operated to produce this clamor.

Sir, the question to-day in the public mind is not so much the salary bill, as it is the Credit Mobilier transaction. That is the subject that is now really before you to a very great extent. The people of the country have learned the words "Credit Mobilier." They are aware of the long investigation had on that subject. My opinion, from all the lights that I am possessed of, is that there never was much in the Credit Mobilier matter first or last, except the fear on the part of good men that their reputation might be tainted. That was the whole of it, in my humble opinion. I do not think the United States Government, I do not think the people's purses, have been injured by that. The fight on that subject was a long one, and it was a drawn one between the political parties, because it was very clearly proven at the investigation that a large portion of the money that was charged to have been used to influence Congress was about equally divided between the two lamented and distinguished gentlemen who figured so conspicuously in that case. One was Hon. Oakes Ames, a venerable gentleman, a gentleman of great enterprise, and I believe one of the best men in the United States. He acted in that case as a business man, and I think from pure motives. He has gone, however, to render an account for all matters pertaining to life before that tribunal at which we shall all have to appear. Upon the other side was the distinguished gentleman, Mr. Brooks, one of the Representatives from the proud city of New York, the great emporium of this mighty nation. Mr. Brooks has likewise gone to his final account. It was found, I think, upon that occasion, that he was the medium or the representative who had as much to do with the matter as any other man, he the leading democrat in the House, and having an eye as to party. The building the road was a great national matter, at that day one of the greatest of the age, and the nation may well be proud of it.

Mr. President, I have loved in my feeble way to study human nature, and from my stand-point during that investigation I have observed many things that are interesting, and many of them very painful. I saw one of the best men that I think I ever made the acquaintance of fall, as it were, by the wayside. He was protected to a very great extent by his friends. I believed at the time that he was a pure and a good man, but he wanted moral courage. It requires moral courage to make a good Christian, because the opposite influences are so great, that men are drawn from the paths of rectitude upon thousands and thousands of occasions directly against their will. Had the man to whom I allude, when the accusation was preferred, remarked clearly and unequivocally, as I have no doubt was the case, that he had participated, to whatever extent it may have been, and that there was no wrong intended on his part in what he did, I think the matter would all have been easy. It was the intent that should have governed the transaction. There never was any necessity for that difficulty; but in the great political struggle it was invoked, and he fell. As a square fight, no harm was done to one or the other party. Honors, or infamy if you please, were easy with the one and the other.

Now, upon the back of that investigation, and directly associated with it, came the hue and cry about the "back-salary grab," and B, trying to enlarge and get in advance of A, calls it the "back-salary steal;" and so we go. Now, I desire to know if it can be said by any Senator here that the law which was enacted upon that subject, and which I will read, was unconstitutional. Here it is:

Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in the Forty-second Congress, holding such office at the passage of this act, and whose claim to a seat has not been adversely decided, shall receive $7,500 per annum each; and this shall be in lieu of all pay and allowance, except actual individual traveling expenses from their homes to the seat of Government and return, by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session of the House to which such Senator, Member, or Delegate belongs, to be certified under his hand to the disbursing officer and filed as a voucher: Provided, That in settling the pay and allowances of the Senators, Members, and Delegates in the Forty-second Congress all mileage shall be deducted and no allowance made for expenses of travel.

That bill was passed on the 3d of March, 1873, and it was under that bill that I drew this money. If that was a "steal," there have been a good many stealing with me. Let it be remembered that that law was based on the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, in these words:

The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Under that law, as contemplated by the Constitution, I have drawn that money. Am I entitled to it by law? Is there a Senator here who will answer in the negative that I am not? If there is, and he will give me light on the subject, I will go with him and refund; because I have not spent mine, and it will not hurt me to do it. But no such response can be given. There is the Constitution of the United States. I have wronged no man to the thousandth part of a fraction. The only question is whether it was a politic law, whether it should have been enacted or not. It was enacted, and I believe no question would have arisen about it but for the facts that I have briefly enumerated—the Credit Mobilier investigation, &c.

Now, sir, while upon the subject of the Credit Mobilier, which was condemned by everybody broadcast throughout this Union, there was not one man out of a thousand throughout the land who knew the meaning of the words "Credit Mobilier," and yet they were condemning it in all parts on the ground that it was a mighty steal, a great fraud, and millions of dollars had been stolen from the Treasury of the United States. Those very people at that moment knew not what they were talking about, except that they were prejudiced upon that branch of the question. They knew just about as much of the meaning of the Credit Mobilier and the history of it as the referee who was called upon on one occasion, which I will detail to you very briefly. The scene, I think, was laid in my own native State, Virginia. Years since there were a couple of young gentlemen at the university there, and as has been the custom for ages in such schools, and as it will continue thousands of years, attachments grew up mutually among the students. There were two who became almost as Damon and Pythias, and they pledged the one to the other that if they ever settled in life they would visit each other. Time rolled on; they were well settled, and they were divines, each teaching, lecturing, and preaching to their respective audiences where they resided. The one visited the other. The local resident who was visited, as a matter of course invited the visiting brother to perform the services, to do the needful for him on Sabbath. "Certainly," was the reply; "with a great deal of pleasure." They wended their way to church. In the mean time, however, he asked his friend, as a prudent man should do, "What is your manner of addressing your congregation? Do you use fine language or do you speak to them in a common-sense style?" "Oh," was the reply, "by all means in a common-sense style; I have nothing to do with fine language; I believe in stating everything plainly and substantially so that the people will understand it; they like it much better." On they went, and he preached his discourse and thought he had acquitted himself very well. On their return he asked his local friend what he thought of his discourse. "Well," said he, "it was very good, except that you did not carry out the agreement between us." "Why," said the other, "in what respect I should like to know; I was remarkably clear and cautious upon the occasion." "Well," said he, "for instance, you used the word 'felicity' instead of 'happiness.'" "Why," said the visiting brother, "there was not an individual in my hearing to-day that did not understand the word 'felicity,' beyond a doubt. I take it for granted that you are mistaken." Said the other, "We will test that; there goes a colored man through the yard; call upon him and see what he will say on the subject." He called him up. Up he came, presenting himself properly. Said the visiting brother, "Look here, I want to ask you if you can tell me the meaning of the word 'felicity.'" "O, yes, sir; yes, sir; I think I can." "All right," said he, "I supposed you could; what is it?" Said the colored man, "Sir, I think it is something inside of a pig." [Laughter.]

The truth is that thousands and thousands of the people who were talking about it would come just as near the meaning of "Credit Mobilier" as that boy did the meaning of the word "felicity;" he did not understand anything about it.

Now, the subject is discussed on the question of back pay. It is said that down South the colored people are remarkably ignorant. The democracy claim to be the custodians of knowledge. Well, they are learned, and I am gratified to know it, and thousands of them are good and pure men. That is equally true. There is another party, however, the republicans, who think they are in the advance and are likewise entitled to wear the honors. The colored man to a great extent is ignored. But upon this occasion look at the facts. You find the fight broadcast, republicans and democrats measuring their steel the one against the other upon the "great steal," as many of them of both parties agree it is. The black man sits quiet and silent by the way, thereby proving that he is better informed than either one of the other parties, because he does not expose himself in crying out and condemning that which he knows nothing about; he compliments himself.

Why, Mr. President, on my return home, directly after the passage of this bill, I met in the State of Texas, at the termination of the railroad upon which I had traveled, a commission merchant of position, who resided at that point. Quite a number of gentlemen were around, and he came running to me and wanted to know if his friend HERNDON, one of my colleagues in the other branch of the Capitol, had voted for "this miserable back-pay steal?" Said I to him, "What do you mean, sir?" Said he, "I hear thus and so. We do not agree in politics; yet I have confidence that you will tell me what is true on this subject." Said I, "Before I answer you, I wish to interrogate you. What newspapers do you read?" "Oh," said he, "I read none. I have long since thrown them all away; they are all lies; I do not read any." "Well," said I, "I do not feel disposed to be interrogated by a man who is so ignorant and prejudiced as to read no newspapers."

That, I think, illustrates the position of the "back-pay salary grab" to a very great extent. That was in my immediate neighborhood. That man knew nothing in the world about it; he knew, however, and declared that he was down on his friend HERNDON if he had voted for it. And right here, while speaking of my friends in the other end of the Capitol, it reminds me of the fact, which I notice with the kindest motives, that in that wing the members from my State are all democrats. They are clever gentlemen and I am fond of them; they are friendly and all right with us. They are all democrats, and every one of them had voted for this bill before it came into this House. I was the only republican from the State, and I voted for it too. It seemed to me that I ought to have been pretty well protected, because those gentlemen had been directly sent up by the people, and were elected upon the platform of reform. I thought on that occasion I could venture to go into democracy, a little at all events. [Laughter.] In I went; but I find I got into bad company, if you take the idle reports, as I hold them to be, that are broadcast throughout the land. I did nothing more on that occasion than they did, and they preceded me. They came directly from the people, and were the first to vote for this bill. I raised no issue with them, but followed them very kindly and very willingly, for I believed it was correct.

Mr. President, the day was when much money was drawn, time and again, from the Treasury of the United States for constructive mileage by my great predecessors, as I will call them, for they are so esteemed in Texas. The lamented Generals Rusk and Houston received their constructive mileage when the Senate was called together for a few days at the expiration of the different Congresses in which they served. Many good men have done so. I have not been benefited by any such act. It is true when we were convened here in extra session of the Senate by the President of the United States, to aid him in matters pertaining to the great treaty between England and the United States on the subject of the Alabama claims, we all responded I came from Texas, I very well know, at a large expense. I asked no questions as to whether I should receive compensation for mileage. I expected none. The subject was referred to the Judiciary Committee, and they reported adverse to the payment of it. Nothing more was said on that occasion, and I thought that was the end of it. But upon my return, at the regular session, after having been here for some time, I learned that a little resolution had passed the Senate allowing mileage to the various Senators. I sat then, as I am gratified I do now, by my honorable friend CLAYTON, who is at present occupying the Chair. I asked him if such was the fact. Perhaps it was from him I got the information. I communicated it directly thereafter, good-naturedly, to my friend General AMES, asking him if he knew anything about it. He replied that he had heard nothing of it. "Well," said I, "I am assured that it is the fact." Said he, "Is that so?" "Now," said I, "give me 10 per cent. for that information if you are lucky." [Laughter.] Off he went, and in a few minutes came back and said, "All right; here it is; I have got it."

Where did that come from? The Senate voted it, and I say righteously. I was absent. I am raising no issue now, mind you, upon it. I say they did right. I was gratified that they did so. I was in no hurry about it, and never drew mine until after the salary bill passed. I knew it was safe in the possession of the financial officer of the Senate. I frequently leave my money there during the whole session, fortunately not having any use for it. I have none under heaven for it now. I have some other similar bills to the one I have shown you, when I want to exhibit them. I do so now simply to show that I am not begging the question in any manner, shape, or form. I received that $1,000 rightfully. I think there would be as much propriety in attempting to dig up that $1,000 mileage—the voting of which was an innovation upon the established rules for a considerable period anterior—as to dig down now by these amendments, and stigmatize those who are not ready to respond to charitable institutions and this, that, and the other.

Why, sir, let me relate what occurred directly after the passage of the salary bill in this proud city of Washington. There are good people here, and I love them. They have always treated me kindly. I hope I have done nothing that would prompt them to do otherwise. They have treated me kindly; but they were more than generous upon this occasion that I am now about to speak of. Some charitable institutions, of what denominations I do not remember and I do not wish to recollect, sent to me propositions directly at my room, suggesting that I could very readily divest myself of everything that pertained to wrong about this matter by contributing the little amount that I received, whatever it might be, to them. They proposed to do what? To be the custodians of that which I had stolen! It was a business that I had never entered into, and I contemptuously paid no further attention to them one way or the other. I manage my own finances.

Now, sir, the expression of the word "finances" presents an idea to me to which I will call the attention of the Senate. The Credit Mobilier is down upon you; the "back-salary grab steal," and thus and so, is upon you; the financial question is upon you and you must dispose of it, and I take it for granted that you will dispose of it correctly, as its great merit demands.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of the guardians of the people, whom I am now addressing, to this fact: At a very early day, when we are likely to get into a discussion and close voting upon the great question of finance, will we find a bowl with soap and towels and everything prepared for the convenience of each and every Senator in the Chamber? "Remarkable," say you; "what an idea! For what purpose?" Sir, for this purpose: I wish to show you now, not as a myth, but substantially, that there is no Senator upon this floor who is not directly voting to replenish his own coffers when he votes upon that question. A resumption of specie payments is spoken of. I am an advocate for that resumption. There are millionaires here who care nothing about this "back-salary grab." It may suit very well to put a high feather, a noble plume, in their caps, because they can very well live without it. These millionaires I envy not. I would like very much to be one of them, properly. I have not received those blessings in life, however, that would enable me to reach that point. There are many of them here. I wish we all were, and I think if we all were, the interests of the United States would be in just as good hands as they are at present. I deplore not that fact; I am gratified at it. But, sir, he who owns his millions in greenbacks the day that we bring about resumption, if gold is worth 10 per cent. premium, adds merely another million to his finances. How can you canvass that question? The people's eyes are upon you. They are talking of the salary grab that we are now discussing and the Credit Mobilier. They will go into all the avenues and ramifications of your action in every respect, and they will visit them upon A, B, and C.

I am gratified to know that I stand here independent. I have a few thousands, and if we should resume to-day I could very well afford to vote to waive my little pittance of back salary, because the result of such a resumption would be more to me in proportion than I would receive from the "salary grab."

Are we not to represent the people of this mighty nation because our interests are identical with those of the people? In canvassing for office in the various States of this proud Union it has always been usual for a man to say that his interests were directly identified with those whom he wished to represent, thereby intimating that they might confidently rely upon him, that if he were benefited, he being a selfish man, as candidates are often accused of being, they would likewise be, and the answer is often thus given.

Now, sir, that financial question is to be disposed of, and I ask you if one consideration is not just as legitimate as the other. I voted for the salary bill. I am yet for it. I am opposed to this amendment. The amendment is unfair. It cannot be equalized. A number of Senators, one-third perhaps, went out at the expiration of the last session who were beneficiaries under that bill. What benefit can you reap now by digging into the pockets of those gentlemen? You cannot do it. It is invidious and objectionable in that regard. I care not what you place the salary at particularly. But I voted for the bill, and I am not going to come up here and confess that I was in error, unless I should first be convinced that I was in error, and when so convinced, there is no man who would retract earlier than I would. I do not think it would have taken me as many months as it has some of my distinguished friends who have thus acquitted themselves to learn that fact. Not having done it, I propose to remain where I stood originally. I am for the bill as it was enacted in 1873.

But, say the opponents of the measure, it was done in the last moments of the session. That shows the ignorance that is abroad on the subject and the prejudices that overwhelm us. When could it have been enacted? An appropriation must be made at every session of Congress for the expenses of the Government for all purposes pertaining to it, both great and small. Is there a Solomon here who could so readily tell who was the proper mother of the child? His courtiers were laughing in their sleeves at the dilemma in which he was placed, thinking that they would be called upon every moment to cut the Gordian knot, and relieve the young judge by giving him an idea; but he gave the order to his officer, the executioner, to divide the child. "No, no," exclaimed one. Said he, "There is the mother," and the case was settled. We have not that wisdom here. No Senator here can anticipate and get up an appropriation bill three months before the adjournment of Congress. We have not been blessed with any such wisdom. I do not say that it would be a blessing even if we had it. Perhaps it would be. But, sir, those bills have never been enacted at any other period than at the close of the session.

So far as I am concerned, so far as my colleague in the Senate is concerned, this question is a matter of very small moment. Our mileage was about one thousand dollars. That is covered up in the $7,500. Then there were other items that we received. So far as we are concerned, we can well compare with any of our predecessors, for the records do not show that we have drawn anything like the amount of other Senators who have gone before us. They received their constructive mileage and various other things.

The seat that I have the honor to occupy now, representing the State of Texas in part, was vacated, not in a way that I desired it should be. An attempt to secede brought that about and created a vacancy. After due course of fighting and enacting of laws, there was an invitation extended to us, upon particular terms, known as the reconstruction laws, to reoccupy these seats. I was complimented with one of them. Now, to show just how things work occasionally: when we came here we brought proper credentials. We had complied with the letter of the law to the thousandth part of a fraction, I think. We had been very particular. Lest there should be some objection—some error—we brought the regular certificate of the acting general of that department, General Reynolds, who had supervised the election, the returns, and everything of the kind having been made to him. We likewise brought the certificate of our executive, the governor of the State. When they were presented they were laid upon the table. The distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee at that time, for reasons well known to himself, kept us out of our seats for about a month. Finally, my distinguished friend, Senator Sherman, called upon the chairman of the committee to report, so that the Senate might take action in the Texas case. The distinguished chairman, Judge Trumbull, declined to do so, letting the honorable Senator from Ohio know that he was attending to that subject and at the proper time he would make a report. He could not exactly say at what hour or what day, but it was sufficient to know that it was his business. "Well," said my friend from Ohio, "I think I will test that matter;" and he brought the question before the Senate, and the Senate overruled the distinguished chairman. The question was taken up and we were admitted. I do not think there was five minutes' discussion. We were admitted directly, because, as I remarked, everything was all proper, and there could be no question about the matter. What were the facts following? I merely mention this to show that so far as we are concerned, we have not run our hands into the Treasury beyond law, and that all laws pertaining to those interests have not been remarkably liberal; but still neither my colleague nor myself condescended to raise the question in the Senate. The Senate had ruled, and we were ready to abide by that rule.

In the other House the members from Texas were received upon the motion of General BUTLER, who does things in General BUTLER'S way. He does them manfully, nobly, quickly, and boldly, and, I think, generally correctly. He moved that the Representatives from Texas be accepted and seated. They were, and I think the record will show that they received their pay, not from the moment that they were seated, but back to the time when the Congress to which they were elected began its term.

My colleague here and myself had been elected in February. Upon the 31st of March we were sworn in. We were here a month, doubly armed with credentials to which no objections were raised first or last, no technicalities, no broad questions, and we were bearing our own expenses, and we were paid, by a resolution of the Senate, from the 31st day of March. We got nothing out of the United States in that transaction. We have not overdrawn our pay. We have drawn no back salary in any way, manner, or shape in this instance, and the little pittance that we have received under this general law, in excess over that which we had previously received, is a very small matter. The amendment now before us leaves us just about statu quo, just precisely where we were originally. We are no losers by it.

But that is not the question. I am not here to put in a plea of guilty and disgorge that which they say I have improperly come in possession of. I say the Constitution of the United States, and all the laws based upon it, authorize me to act as I have acted and as I expect to act.

Now, by way of illustration, I call the attention of the Senate to a little article published in the Chronicle, of this city, a few days since, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

There was formerly constructive mileage paid to members of the United States Senate, who were called to meet in extra session after the adjournment of Congress, under the fiction that they could make journeys home, and return to the capital from the most distant points in the nation in a day or two. Some Senators had constitutional scruples, and refused to receive this extra allowance, which to those from long distances amounted to as much as the per diem for a whole session. Among those was Senator Mouton, of Louisiana, who represented that State from 1837 to 1841. Now he wants his back pay, too. A request was received at the Treasury Department Thursday that the mileage which he had not drawn for two special sessions of the Senate might be forwarded to him.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Now, Mr. President, I can see the propriety very readily, from that notification to the Department, of my friends here urging these amendments to have the nails or the screws so conclusively fastened in the coffin of this odious bill that it never can be resurrected under any circumstances, so that they thereby might be enabled upon a change of their views subsequently to demand it again. They believe exactly what they are doing. So did Senator Mouton, a high-toned gentleman from the proud State of Louisiana. He would not take his constructive mileage at the time, but many years afterward he comes here and says, "It is my right now, and I want it; I am not going to leave any such interregnum."

Mr. President, as I remarked in the outset, I look upon this as a very important question, differing from a number of my friends in that regard; and in connection with my remarks on the subject I ask for the reading of the "Report of the Secretary of the Senate, submitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 17, 1873, information in relation to the fixing of salaries of Senators and Representatives in Congress from the formation of the Government."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1874.

Hon. MATT. H. CARPENTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore:

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 17th ultimo, calling for information concerning salaries of Senators and Representatives in Congress, I have the honor to furnish the following:

I.—The several rates of compensation fixed by various laws, and the cases in which the same were retroactive, and for what length of time.

1. By the act of September 22, 1789, the compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress was fixed at six dollars a day, and thirty cents a mile for traveling to and from the seat of Government. This rate was to continue until March 4, 1795. The same act fixed the compensation from March 4, 1795, to March 4, 1796, (at which last-named date, by its terms, it expired,) at seven dollars a day, and thirty-five cents a mile for travel.

This act was retroactive, extending back six months and eighteen days, namely, to March 4, 1789.

2. The act of March 10, 1796, fixed the compensation at six dollars a day, and thirty cents a mile for travel. (This act extended back over six days only.)

The act of March 19, 1816, fixed the compensation at $1,500 a year, "instead of the daily compensation," and left the mileage unchanged.

This act was retroactive, extending back one year and fifteen days, namely, to March 4, 1815.

(This act was repealed by the act of February 6, 1817, but it was expressly declared that no former act was thereby revived.)

4. The act of January 22, 1818, fixed the compensation at eight dollars a day, and forty cents a mile for travel.

This act was retroactive, extending back fifty-three days, namely, to the assembling of Congress, December 1, 1817.

5. The act of August 16, 1856, fixed the compensation at $3,000 a year, and left the mileage unchanged.

This act was retroactive, extending back one year five months and twelve days, namely, to March 4, 1855.

6. The act of July 28, 1866, fixed the compensation at $5,000 a year, and twenty cents a mile for travel, (not to affect mileage-accounts already accrued.)

This act was retroactive, extending back one year four months and twenty-four days, namely, to March 4, 1865.

7. The act of March 3, 1873, fixed the compensation at $7,500 a year, and actual traveling expenses; the mileage already paid for the Forty-second Congress to be deducted from the pay of those who had received it.

This act was retroactive, extending back two years, namely, to March 4, 1871.

NOTE.—Stationery was allowed to Senators and Representatives without any special limit until March 3, 1868, when the amount for stationery and newspapers for each Senator and Member was limited to $125 a session. This was changed by a subsequent act, taking effect July 1, 1869, to $125 a year. The act of 1873 abolished all allowance for stationery and newspapers.

II.—Names of Senators who drew pay under the retroactive provisions of the several laws, amounts drawn, and dates of same.

Act of 1789.—The records of my office do not furnish the exact information desired under this head concerning the First Congress, the compensation of which was fixed by act of September 22, 1789.

It appears, however, that the account of each Senator was made up, and that each received the amount allowed by law. The following is a copy from the record:

January 19, 1790.—That there is due to the Senators of the United States for attendance in Congress the present session, to the 31st day of March inclusive, and expenses of travel to Congress as allowed by law, as follows, to wit:

III.—Names of Senators who covered into the Treasury amounts due them under retroactive provisions of law, with date of such action.

There is no record in my office showing that any Senator covered into the Treasury any money to which he was entitled by the retroactive provisions of either of the acts of September 22, 1789, March 19, 1816, January 22, 1818, August 16, 1856, or July 28, 1866.

The following Senators covered into the Treasury the amounts due them under the retroactive provision of the act of March 3, 1873, namely:

May	26.	H. B. Anthony	$4,497 20
June	23.	W. A. Buckingham	4,553 60

NOTE.—Several of these Senators, as well as others who have not either drawn or covered into the Treasury the amounts due them under the retroactive provision of the act of 1873, expressed to me their intention to allow the money to lapse into the Treasury by the ordinary operation of law, which they supposed would occur July 3, 1873. After learning that it could not be covered in, except by their order, before July 3, 1875, some gave me written instructions to anticipate the latter date. I am unable to furnish from any information in my office the names of Senators who themselves paid into the Treasury salary drawn under the act of 1873 or previous acts. I have not furnished the names of Senators who have left increased salary undrawn, as this information was not called for in the resolution.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Now, Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to be so kind as to read a telegraphic dispatch which I have just received.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, January 6, 1874.

Hon. J. W. FLANAGAN, United States Senate:

The books of Register of the Treasury show that W. T. Clarke received $11,380.80; E. Degener, $11,596.80; J. C. Conner, $11,430.43; G. W. Whittemore, $11,632.80, pay for Forty-first Congress, in which is included the additional or full salary allowed by resolution of House of Representatives of March 3, 1871. The Register can furnish statement in detail if required.

A. M. WYMAN, Cashier.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, as I remarked in the absence of this authority which I had sent for, the members of the House from Texas, by resolution of March 3, 1871, were protected in the nice little sum of $11,000 and large hundreds, whereas my colleague here and myself were only the beneficiaries of the simple pittance of $5,000 a year, from the 31st day of March. The House recognized the right to back salaries in the transaction of the Texas Representatives directly after their admission in March, 1870; and so far as her Senators stand before their constituents in Texas, and the people of the United States, if you please, the only objection that could be urged against them, it seems to me, is that they have not been vigilant enough to get that which they were entitled to, because I presume the Representatives were entitled to that which they were given, and that amounted to thousands of dollars more than we have received. In that instance, in 1871, they received back pay, and in 1873 likewise for the Forty-second Congress.

My object was to present these facts so that they could stand forth and vindicate our course against any such charges as are preferred here, and I feel proud that the nation can boast of such ability as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] for introducing the resolution and getting those facts officially before the people broadcast throughout the United States for the benefit of those that have so simply, as I contend, exposed themselves through their prejudices without any knowledge on the subject.

I might go on and declare, what lawyers well understand, that when a witness is placed on the stand, if he testifies to a fact when he really did not know it, he is perjured. Those people know all about this though they are ignorant: and they are not few—I regret that they are so numerous. When I as a boy heard the conversation of gentlemen of talent, I loved to catch the droppings, and I heard it occasionally said that "the fools were not all dead yet." Thought I, "from what you say, they are closing out very rapidly;" but at that period we were only about ten or eleven millions of people, and now we are forty millions, and I think they have held their own most admirably. [Laughter.] They are with us yet; and that is the class that have arraigned us here to-day, led by A, B, and C, who marshaled them from the various grog-shops, near which they have in combination a little hand-press to manufacture anything that tends to excite; but it is their daily living, just as it is with the ox, the sheep, and the goat, that go into the broad field of God's beautiful green grass to make their daily living. They care nothing about the interests of the country. Patriotism! I think I heard the word "patriotism" invoked yesterday by some distingnished friend discussing this branch of the subject; but it ought not to be brought in company with the proposition here before us. Degrading it is to the Senate of the United States to stand thus pandering to such prejudices as I allude to, and not to the intelligence of the country. Our action in this case has simply been that which is to be found paralleled by legislation, running back nearly a century to the acts of the great spirits that this nation and the world so proudly boasts of, the mighty names of Clay, Webster, Cass, Calhoun, a host of them, having belonged to all political parties, the whig, democratic, republican, liberal-republican, conservative, &c. Take them when and where you may, they always looked to their interest to some extent, but I believe none of them transcended the proper action they should have taken. Guided by the Constitution of the United States, I think there has been no error in any sense of the word, and there is only now wanting, as in the Credit Mobilier case, firmness and courage on the part of Senators to show that they are Senators.

When our Constitution was formed it was not contemplated that Senators were to be boys, ready on all occasions to take up their paddles or sticks and go out into a general play of bull-pen or marbles. In the game of marbles, for instance, as many of you may remember, one would finally say, "well, I am fat; I give up the money; I will put my hand in and pull it out." I am not so fat; I am lean. [Laughter.] I do not propose to pull mine out, or go into a game of marbles. I went into this matter understandingly. I committed no error, and certainly, by the laws of the land, I have committed no crime. I defy the most strict scrutiny. I ask no pardon in any way or shape, but that justice be meted out to me; and, when placed in the scales side by side with my democratic friends in Texas or elsewhere, I think it will be found that in this respect, if anything is to be charged to me, it is that I have been remiss—that I have not received that money which the Government of the United States absolutely owes me. Sir, that is my conscientious belief; for, as I remarked before, my colleague and myself were seated on the 31st of March, 1870, and we were paid by resolution from that day only, whereas the Representatives in the other House were seated on the 3d of that month, and they not only received pay from the 3d, but went back a whole year to the beginning of that Congress.

Mr. President, I ask pardon for having detained, in my desultory manner, the Senate as long as I have. There is much more I should like to say on this subject. What I have said has been merely for my own vindication, so that my constituents may see unmistakably what my acts have been, and that I retract nothing that I have done. I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the Chair.) Mr. President, having voted for the salary bill passed at the last session, and intending now to vote for its repeal, I wish to state, as briefly as possible, my reasons for voting for its repeal.

I have practiced law twenty-five years. I charge my clients what I think they ought to pay. If they object to the amount, I receive what they are willing to pay. To this there has been only one exception. In one case I thought my client acted badly, and sued him for compensation, demanding $1,000. He pleaded that my services had been of no value. I discontinued the suit, paid my own costs, and sued him again for $2,000 and interest. He interposed the same defense. I noticed the case for trial, called his own lawyer to the stand, proved my services to be worth considerably more than $2,000, and recovered judgment for that sum and interest. My client then came to me and told me what I did not know—that he owned a lot of land worth $6,000, upon which my judgment was a lien; that he was in great distress financially, and that if I would discharge his judgment he would sell the lot and pay me $1,000; and if he ever could pay the balance of the judgment he would, and if he could not he would not. I said "all right." I discharged the judgment; he sold the lot, put the money in his pocket, and I have never seen him since. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I propose to deal with my constituents as I deal with my clients. If we disagree about my compensation, I shall settle with them upon their own terms. When the salary bill came before the Senate at the last session I believed, as I have ever since I had any opinions whatever in regard to public matters, or business matters, or any matters whatever, that the only way to obtain a sound article was to pay a sound price, and that the only way to obtain faithful public service was to pay a fair compensation. I believed it to be for the best interests of the people to pay a liberal compensation to all public servants. The Constitution, moreover, provides that Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States; that is, in money. It is plain from the debates in the convention which framed the Constitution, and all the political literature of that day, that those who framed the Constitution were determined to strike down the idea of voluntary and uncompensated service. They believed that such a principle would close the two Houses of Congress against poor men and foster an aristocracy. This provision of the Constitution was not inserted by accident, nor carelessly drawn. Every principle involved in it was fully debated and maturely considered. It was determined, first, that service in Congress should be compensated; second, that it should be compensated by the United States; and, third, that the compensation should be in money. They believed that the idea of the representative being the servant of the people could only be realized by requiring the servant to receive a pecuniary compensation, which compensation the Constitution made it imperative upon Congress to fix for themselves.

Entertaining these views I have uniformly voted in favor of liberal salaries for all public officers. I have voted to increase the salaries of judges, Cabinet officers, Bureau officers, clerks in the Departments, and all other public servants. I have done this from a sense of duty. I never acted more conscientiously in my life than when I voted for the salary bill at the last session. I have seen nothing to lead me to change my opinion. I have read columns of abuse without a sentence of argument, and I can see but one reason why this law should be repealed; that is, that the people demand it. And this brings me to consider for a moment the duty of a Senator thus circumstanced.

The theory of this Government entertained by the federalists was clearly expressed by Richard Rush in a pamphlet published by him in 1788, in these words:

> It is often said that the sovereign and all other power is vested in the people. This is an unfortunate expression. It should be, all power is derived from the people. They possess it only on their election day. After that it is the property of their rulers.

This theory has, happily, long since been repudiated. The principle now recognized is, not that the people elect their sovereigns or rulers, but that the people govern through their agents or servants. Every act passed in Congress, every judgment rendered by the Supreme Court, and every act of the Administration, is the act of the people, as the act of the agent is the act of his principal. We are accustomed to call ourselves the servants of the people. The correlative truth that the people are our masters is not as often repeated nor as fully appreciated. Could the question be submitted to the people of Wisconsin to-day, the salary law of last session would be repealed five to one. I regard myself as their agent upon this floor in regard to this subject, and in my opinion all the principles applicable to the relation of principal and agent apply to the relations which exist between a representative and his constituency.

And what is the duty of an agent sent abroad to transact the business of his principal? He is bound to exercise his best discretion and judgment in the first instance; but having adopted a certain policy, which he firmly believes will promote the interests of his principal, if he is informed that his principal disapproves of his course he is morally bound to change it, and that, too, whether his opinion be changed or not. Regarding myself as one of the agents of the people of Wisconsin, and knowing their wishes, it is my pleasure, as it is my duty, to vote as I know they would if this question could be submitted to them. I shall vote for the repeal of this law, as instructed by the republican State convention of Wisconsin—its unconditional repeal—and I shall vote to carry the repeal back just so far as the Constitution will permit. I congratulate my friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] that he has sounded the key-note on this subject. My friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] proposes to repeal the salary law from the present time, permitting Senators and Representatives to retain the pay they have received at the increased rate, and to receive compensation hereafter at the rate of $5,000 per annum. I enlist under the banner of my great and good friend from Indiana. I will vote with him to carry the effect of his repeal back to the 4th of March last. I would vote to carry it back to the 4th of March, 1871, but for the impediment of the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That's no objection.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a decided objection. We have no more power to repeal the law fixing the compensation for the last Congress, and under which the members of that Congress received pay, than we have to repeal the law under which Andrew Jackson received his salary as President. It is a familiar principle of law, one laid down by all elementary writers, that an act making an appropriation of money, when executed by payment and receipt, is beyond the repealing power of the Legislature. You may, indeed, declare the law to be repealed, but the repealing act would be of no effect. What has been received by a citizen from the Government in pursuance of law the legislative power can no more retake than it can take any other of his property.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me? As I differ with him radically I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; I am subject to cross-examination.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Wisconsin, I understand, wishes the repeal to go back to the 4th of March, 1873, and to make deduction from the compensation.

Mr. CARPENTER. I see the Senator's point. He is sticking in the bark. I concede that we cannot pass a bill repealing the provisions of this act so as to take back what Senators received last month; but we can do what is equivalent—we can say that for the rest of the year Senators shall only receive such a sum as, added to what we have received, shall make our whole compensation for this Congress $10,000.

Mr. STEWART. Cannot we say for the same reason, and upon the same principle, that we will only take ten dollars, or take nothing, until the two sums so far meet that the back pay is extinguished? Cannot we do that?

Mr. CARPENTER. The trouble about that, Mr. President, is this: the salary of the last Congress is not the subject under consideration now, nor is it within the jurisdiction of this Congress. The salary of this Congress, from this time forth, is subject to our jurisdiction. We may fix that compensation at fifty dollars a month.

Mr. STEWART. Is the salary from this time back under our jurisdiction?

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all. I concede the gentleman's point so far as the bark is concerned.

Mr. CONKLING. How is it in regard to the bite?

Mr. CARPENTER. So far as the bite is concerned, there is nothing in the Senator's point.

Mr. STEWART. Then, if we have nothing to do with what has been received, why should we take from them a portion of their salary? Why do you do that? Because you have the power to do it, simply? Where is your reason for it? You say you have the power because they received it illegally; that they ought not to have received it because it was an excessive charge and exorbitant.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all.

Mr. STEWART. Of course it goes upon that theory, that it was exorbitant and unjust, or you would not deduct from their future pay. If it was exorbitant and unjust to take the pay from the 4th of March last, certainly the "back-pay grab," as it is termed, was much more exorbitant and unjust; and why do you not deduct that from those who are here and over whom you have power? Why do you not deduct from what the Government shall become indebted to them until you get even with them as far as possible?

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a long question up to this point.

Mr. STEWART. What is the difference in a constitutional point of view? Is the Constitution in the way of deducting this back pay from the present salary? That is the constitutional point which the Senator from Wisconsin puzzles me about. I say we have the constitutional power to deduct anything we choose from any member's pay, and for any reason that seems satisfactory to Congress.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am sorry if I have puzzled my friend from Nevada, but I am certainly not puzzled by this question myself. It is clear, I think, that without a flagrant violation of the spirit of the Constitution we could not pass a law saying that democrats should have $50 a month and republicans $100 a month.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CARPENTER. I yield to everybody, especially to the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I am always disposed in legislation to follow my friend from Wisconsin if I possibly can, and therefore I should like to propound a question to him in order to get my own mind at ease upon the subject. The Senator says you cannot pay a democrat one salary and a republican another. If that rule is good, then you cannot pay one Senator one salary and another Senator another, can you?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly not.

Mr. LOGAN. A few weeks ago a Senator from California resigned after having drawn $5,000 of his pay. A Senator has been elected in his place. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would explain to me how much that Senator is to get when he comes in, provided his theory is carried out?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have not examined that subject, and I have not been retained as a lawyer on the legal question. When it comes up I will think of it, and then I will inform the Senator what I think of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. That is a very nice way to get out of the difficulty, and my friend from Wisconsin always has a very easy way of dodging questions. The question is this, and it is a plain and simple one: You cannot legislate so as to give one Senator a different salary from another, and yet the Senator who is to come in from California will, under this bill, get a different salary from his predecessor. You legislate in reference to the Senators that are here now, back to the 4th of March last. The late Senator from California has not been here from the 4th of March to this time. Hence it does not affect him, and he is paid a different salary from Senators now on the floor. That is the proposition which I wish the Senator would explain. The Senator from California has received his salary at the rate of $625 a month up to the day he resigned, and your bill affects Senators here who voted for or against the bill, so that they only get a reduced rate of salary for that same time. I should like the Senator to explain the consistency of that.

Mr. CARPENTER. The new Senator from California will be entitled to receive the same compensation for the term of his service that shall be receivable by other Senators for the same term. If we should to-day fix the compensation, for the remainder of the two years which this Congress has to serve, at fifty dollars a month, the new Senator from California would, in common with all the rest of us, receive pay at that rate. According to the usages of the Senate, the new Senator will be entitled to the compensation fixed by law from the resignation of the old Senator; that is, he will be entitled to pay at the rate of $7,500 from the resignation of his predecessor down to the passage of this bill, and thereafter whatever compensation shall be fixed by this bill. The new Senator may regret that he did not serve during the period when Senators received a higher compensation; but he cannot complain that he does not receive during his term of service the same compensation received by other Senators during the same term.

What I mean to maintain is this, that the compensation of all the Senators must be alike at any one time, or during any one period; but that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to fix the compensation for the first year of any Congress at $7,500, and for the second year at $2,500; and that under such a regulation Senators who come in during the second year would be on an equality with all other Senators coming in during that year.

Hence, we can so adjust the compensation for the remainder of this Congress that during every day of the two years the pay of all the Senators shall be at the same rate, and the aggregate pay for the entire Congress shall be $10,000 for each Senator and Representative. This, I concede, is whipping the devil around the stump, but it is whipping him constitutionally around the stump. But should we attempt by such legislation to reclaim from members of this Congress what they received for services in the last Congress above $5,000 per annum? This equality of compensation would not exist for the service rendered in this Congress. In other words, if we should now provide that those members of the present Congress who received the increased pay in the last Congress should receive $5,000 less for their services in this Congress than should be received by the members of this Congress who did not receive that increased pay, then it would result that there would be sitting in this Chamber at the same time one class of Senators receiving compensation at one rate, and another at a different rate. This would be a discrimination which would be unconstitutional, unless it can be maintained that it would be constitutional to discriminate between Senators, as to compensation, upon political or other grounds.

I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PIATT,] to steer clear of the constitutional objection, because under it every Senator will receive the same compensation during any one period of service in this Congress. His amendment proceeds upon the presumption that every member has received $625 a month from the 3d day of March last up to and including the 3d day of the present month, and that he will be entitled to pay at that rate until the passage of this bill; and that from and after the passage of this bill each Senator shall receive such sum as, when added to the sum he shall have received at the time when this bill takes effect, shall make $10,000. That is, the pay of Senators from the passage of this bill shall be less than heretofore; but what shall have been received under the existing law is not reclaimed.

I say every Senator has received $6,250; because that is the sum ascertained by law, and the Constitution declares that Senators shall receive the compensation ascertained by law; and every Senator has sworn to support the Constitution.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator means then, as I understand him—in which case we do not differ—that this Congress has the power to fix the salary from this time forward?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Nobody doubts that; but does the Senator maintain that Congress has the power to deduct the amount that has been received in fixing that salary in the law?

Mr. CARPENTER. We deduct nothing. We have received $6,250 up to the present time; that is, I desire to state that I have; and if it is material I will state that I have spent it faithfully and thoroughly. [Laughter.] Now, I know of no power under the Constitution to get a cent of that back. If there is any such power, still I have no interest in the subject. It is a question between the Government and my creditors, to whom I have paid the money, and they may fight it out. [Laughter.] I have received $6,250, and know that every other Senator has, because the Constitution requires him to do so. The Constitution says he shall receive what is ascertained by law as his compensation. It is not a matter of choice with him; he shall receive it; and I know my brethren around me have received it, every man of them; and I accept no statement on parol to contradict the record and the presumption of the law. [Laughter.] We have, then, received $6,250. We can say that for the remainder of these two years the compensation shall be a sum to be named in the bill, to be paid monthly, which sum, when added to the other, will make $10,000.

Mr. President, I do not sympathize with what seems to be a desire to satisfy the people, that we would if we could, but cannot, help retaining the increase of pay for the year that has just closed. I dealt squarely and openly with the people in voting for the increase of pay, and I will deal squarely and openly with them in repealing the law as far as it can be repealed, because they demand it, and it is my duty to obey.

Mr. STEWART. This is a very interesting subject, and I desire to say a few words more upon it.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the attention of the Senator from Nevada for a moment.

Mr. STEWART. I shall be through in one moment. I regret that the Senator from Wisconsin did not go a little further and accomplish the real result which seems to be aimed at. I regret that he could not see his way clear. The Constitution rose up in his way. Now, I undertake to say, as I said before, that there is no difference in principle between going back to March 4, 1871, and to March 4, 1873. In each case there have been monthly installments and monthly payments of the accounts. You say that certain Senators having received certain compensation under an existing law, shall, in the future, have only such compensation as shall, back to March last, make the yearly compensation $5,000, and you say that that will operate on those present equally. Now I say that going back two years further would operate equally in the same way, for those who were not members of the Forty-second Congress did not receive this extra pay at all. They never have at any time received more than $5,000 a year. It is said that this law was contrary to public opinion, and wrong. Then nobody ought at any time ever to have received more than at the rate of $5,000 a year. But certain persons have received more than that. It only applies to those persons who have received more than $5,000 a year, reducing their compensation to what they ought to have received. There is no doubt about the constitutional power, because it only applies to the future. The Government says, "We have got an offset against you in morals and in equity; we will make the law correspond with the equity." There is no doubt about the constitutional power if you mean to do this thing. If you mean to do this thing, disgorge the back pay in consequence of which all this difficulty arose. It seems to me the logic of the case—everything indicates that if you go back at all, you should go back manfully and meet the whole question. I think that is the proper way to undo what has been done. I will not vote for the principle that we shall go back to the 4th of March and refund a portion of the salary that we have received because we have improperly received it, and then retain the other. The principle is wrong. It places the Senate in a false position.

Mr. EDMUNDS obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I am desirous of moving that the Senate go into executive session for a special purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only three o'clock. I think we had better finish this bill to-night.

Mr. CAMERON. I am afraid we cannot do so. I want to say a word or two upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have, you know, rather a bankrupt Treasury, and we have had a long holiday, and it is only three o'clock. We might possibly, without great injury to ourselves, go on for two or three hours yet. I think, Mr. President, I shall be obliged to proceed.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me, I shall be perfectly willing to return again to open session. There is a question which I desire to present to the Senate in executive session, of great importance to the country just now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the honorable Senator means to say that he only desires an executive session for the doing of a particular thing, and not then, as the usual habit is, to have the Senate adjourn and go home, but to open the doors and have this business finished, that is another thing.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to have an executive session only for a special purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, Mr. President, the moment that I have concluded the very little I have to say, I will move the executive session that my friend requires, with the purpose, not of adjourning the Senate, but of having the doors opened again, and this business settled before we adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope that purpose will not be regarded as binding on any other member of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not propose to bind anybody. I only propose to bind everybody to whatever a majority of the Senate may decide; and if the honorable Senator is so anxious to have the use of his money until to-morrow before he gives it back, as I am equally for my own individual purposes, as to insist upon an adjournment, we will try conclusions upon that. I only say that when I have finished the little I have and am able to say, I will move for my friend from Pennsylvania an executive session, not for the purpose of adjourning the Senate afterward, but for the purpose of promoting the public interest that he has in charge, and then to open the doors again to finish this affair.

I am not troubled, Mr. President, with the constitutional difficulty that seems to labor in most men's minds here in respect to returning money to the Treasury, for that is the flat of it. Since the 4th of March we have all, or substantially all I have no doubt, as our occasions required, drawn the sum that the law allowed to us. There was no visible way of separating that particular sum from some other sum which the law already repealed had formerly allowed, while we could refuse to take what had been proposed to us before, where our accounts were brought to a close, and still leave the extra money in the Treasury. So, then, I am ready to vote and intend to vote for that measure which shall absolutely repeal this misguided and misunderstood law that we passed at the last session of Congress; and I am frank to say that I vote for that repeal not because I believe the compensation for the future of $7,500 to be excessive, but because I believe the law to have been passed by this body under a misunderstanding of what it could do to separate from an appropriation bill a provision to make back pay, as it is called, for every member of the Senate who was going out and for every member of the House of Representatives who was going out, and for every member of each House who was to stay in, for service already performed. We proceeded upon the idea that we could not instruct our own conferees to insist upon striking out this back-salary business.

I would have voted then—and if the country were now in as good a condition as it was then I would vote—now upon a proper and independent bill—not an appropriation bill, for such things have no place there, whatever the precedents may have been—for a separate bill, that could be fairly discussed upon its own merits and no other, and be sent to the solemn judgment of our constituents upon its own merits and nothing else, making a prospective increase of the pay of the members of Congress, because I know from my own experience, living as humbly as I do, that I could not live upon the sum that was paid me before this time as well as the average farmer in the State of Vermont lives in his own State and in his own home. Therefore it was that I should have been quite willing to go home to my constituents and to tell them that for the future I had voted a sufficient and proper salary for myself and my colleagues, so far as my vote would go, as an independent measure, which was not to be squeezed through by any contrivances of legislative machinery, which was not to be carried on the back of some broad appropriation bill, but which was to be submitted to their honest judgment as a measure by itself, which they could rectify in the selection of my successor and my associates' successors at the proper time if they thought we had committed a wrong.

That is one thing. But, Mr. President, I have believed that no provisions for increase of salaries ought to be made in an appropriation bill at all. I know the practice has been otherwise. It is a vicious and a fatal practice, and it ought not to be persevered in. This is the best instance we have had of showing how fatal it is to the just interests of legislation—and I do not speak for parties, but only for the country—how fatal it is for the just interests of legislation that we should ride upon appropriation bills, (which ought only to provide the money for carrying out existing law,) schemes which standing by themselves some Senators or Representatives might think would not command a majority of either House or both Houses of Congress.

I say, Mr. President, that I shall vote now, when I can get the opportunity, for a total repeal, knowing that as to the President of the United States, who has had no hand in this legislation except the formal one of signing the appropriation bill, which he could scarcely refuse under such circumstances, and which, therefore, I justify him in, and as to the judges of the Supreme Court, who, of course, have had no hand in the business at all, it has no effect. A mere repeal is not an unconstitutional act, for it leaves the old law in force as to them, and in form it could be placed in such a condition that this repealing clause as to the President and as to the judges should take effect only when the next President, whoever he may be, should come in, and whenever a vacancy should occur in the Supreme Court and a new judge should come in. You can provide as to them in that way, and as to all the others there is no difficulty; and I say, then, as to these, I vote for a total repeal, or modified by the times when it shall take effect, so as to make it on the face of it constitutional, not because I do not believe that the President of the United States ought to have his salary increased; not that I should criticise, in the least degree, the present honorable Chief Magistrate of our country in taking this pay, which we have given to him and which I believe he deserves; not that I should criticise any judge of the Supreme Court in taking this pay until a vacancy occurs; but only that I think we passed the act of 1873 under a misapprehension in this body as to how we could get at the rejection of the proposed increase of our own salaries, and how we could make that appropriation bill what it ought to have been—an appropriation bill and nothing else. And therefore, if we can pass this total repeal, whenever the condition of the country stands as favorable as it did on the 3d of March, 1873, in the prospects of its business, in the receipts of its Treasury, there shall be presented a bill which shall increase the salaries of the judges who may come in to fill vacancies, and shall increase the salary of the President of the United States for the term yet to come, and shall increase the payment given to the members of the Cabinet, and to members of Congress, I shall vote for it with pleasure. But if it were a new measure now, in the present condition of the industries of the country, when everybody must make some sacrifices in order to keep up the condition of the Treasury and to preserve the honor and the capacity of the Government to meet its obligations without imposing additional burdens upon the people, I believe it is our duty, and the duty of the other officers to whom I have referred, to bear their share of the public burden.

I say, then, Mr. President, that, while I should have voted on the 3d of March or any other time for an independent bill which should have fairly been presented upon its own merits to increase the salaries of the judges and the President and the Cabinet and the members of Congress, I might not do it at this moment if it were presented as a fresh bill, for the reason I have named. But, sir, we proceeded, as you may remember, on that night of the 3d of March, upon the idea that it was not in our power, even as to ourselves, to instruct the conferees on the part of the Senate, our own committee, that they should insist upon striking out all the then proposed increase of salaries except that of the President of the United States; and the Senate, acting upon the judgment that it then had and in the hurry of the moment and with the light that it then had, and in the absence of any precedents which could be named by those who thought the Senate had the power to instruct its conferees, determined that we could not, and that in effect we must either defeat the appropriation bill or go for this increase of salary.

I cannot help believing, Mr. President—I am bound to believe in a technical sense, as the Senate was so careful to try the question of order and was so anxious evidently to have that question of order determined in such a way, if it could be, that we could meet this salary question as to ourselves by itself, and was unable to do so—I am bound to presume that if we could have met it in that way, we should have rejected the increase of our own salary and that of the Cabinet.

I think, Mr. President, that we acted under a grave misapprehension; and I have had a very competent person, whose knowledge of the history of parliamentary law and the course of parliamentary precedents is almost perfect, look back only for a few years to see what our practice had been on that subject. You remember, Mr. President, that the Senate determined, upon an appeal by the then Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Trumbull,] who has now withdrawn to the quiet of private life and who is no more vexed with questions of this kind, that it was not in our power to instruct our own committee to insist that our salaries should not be increased—that we felt ourselves compelled to follow, and, in spite of our wishes and our will that our salaries should not be increased in that way then and there, we found ourselves compelled by what we then thought to be parliamentary law to vote that they should be increased. That, it turns out from an investigation, was an error; and I ask that the Clerk may read the congressional history which I send to the desk on that point.

An examination, extending back but a few years, shows two instances in direct opposition to the ruling of the Senate on the 3d of March last.

At the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress, the committee of conference upon a bill "to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes" having reported on the 1st of March, 1864, to the House of Representatives their inability to agree, a resolution was offered by Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, as follows:

"Resolved, That the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments to House bill No. 122, and that the House request of the Senate another committee of conference on the said bill; and it is hereby declared to be the judgment of this House that in an adjustment of the differences between the two Houses on the said bill, there should be an additional duty of not less than twenty nor more than forty cents per gallon imposed on spirits on hand for sale." (Cong. Globe, p. 892 pt. 1, 1st sess. 38th Cong.)

A question of order being raised, the decision of the Speaker (Mr. Colfax) was as follows:

"The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the House of Representatives has the power to instruct any committee which it authorizes to be appointed. It is a judicious check upon the power of the Speaker in appointing committees. They have a right to instruct a committee of conference as they have a right to instruct a standing or a select committee. The gentleman from Illinois moves this himself as a resolution. It seems, however, susceptible of division, first, upon asking another committee of conference, and, secondly, upon the instructions. As to the right to move instructions the Chair has no doubt." (Cong. Globe, pt. 1, 1st sess. 38th Cong., p. 892.)

The decision of the Speaker was acquiesced in by the House, no appeal being taken, and the resolution of Mr. Washburne was agreed to.

On the following day, the action of the House of Representatives having been communicated to the Senate, the Senator from Ohio, Mr. SHERMAN, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the conference requested by the House of Representatives be agreed to; and that the conferees heretofore appointed by the Senate be instructed to agree to proper amendments to the Senate amendments disagreed to by the House, providing for a tax of not exceeding twenty cents a gallon on spirits on hand for sale." (Ibid., p. 900.)

The late Senator from Maine, Mr. Fessenden, at once suggested a doubt as to the resolution being in order; to which the Senator from Ohio replied, as follows:

"I have not examined for precedents, but I think there can be no doubt of the power of the Senate to instruct its conferees on any point. It is a question of discretion. Ordinarily it would not be done; but there have been two conferences on this disagreement, which has all grown out of one difference. The House of Representatives have now expressed their opinion on that difference, and I think the Senate ought also to do so." (Ibid., p. 900.)

Mr. Fessenden then raised the question of order directly for the decision of the Chair, and the Vice-President, who is now Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN gave his decision in the following words:

"The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair can have no doubt that the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio is in order. Conferences are of two characters—free, and simple. A free conference is that which leaves the committee of conference entirely free to pass upon any subject where the two branches have disagreed in their votes, not, however, including any action upon any subject where there has been a concurrent vote of both branches. A simple conference—perhaps it should more properly be termed a strict or a specific conference, though the parliamentary term is 'simple'—is that which confines the committee of conference to the specific instructions of the body appointing it. The Chair therefore rules that the resolution is in order."

In the discussion which ensued, the Senator from Ohio said:

"The Senate might very properly object to any action by the Senate conferees which was not strictly within the parliamentary rule, but the Senate itself may, by its instructions, enlarge the power of the committee. There is no doubt about that. There is no limit to the power of the Senate over its committees. It may authorize its conferees to agree to amendments to its amendments, which might not be in order if those amendments to the amendments came directly from the conferees without the action of the Senate. That is the view all the conferees took, although they differed on the question of parliamentary law." (Ibid., p. 900.)

In the course of the debate, Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, said:

"I agree with the decision of the President of the Senate that it is competent to instruct a committee of conference on the part of the Senate." (Ibid., p. 902.)

Again he said:

"In respect to the questions of disagreement, the Senate may instruct its part of the committee, but outside of the questions of disagreement the Senate cannot instruct that committee, for the reason that that is not one of the modes of legislation known to parliamentary usages. * * * The Senate may instruct the committee upon all the questions that were referred to that committee, but not upon other questions." (Ibid., p. 902 and 903.)

From this view of parliamentary law, no Senator dissented, although the debate on the subject-matter extends over many pages of the Congressional Globe.

The result of the debate, which was quite protracted, was the rejection of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, although no one doubted the right of the Senate to instruct the conferees, and the adoption of the following resolution offered by Mr. Conness, of California:

"Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 1st instant, proposing instructions to the conferees, and ask another free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes." (Ibid., p. 907.)

The House of Representatives having agreed to a further free conference, the conferees on again meeting, were unable to agree, and the bill was disposed of by the Senate receding from its amendments.

The proceedings in this case, as in that which follows, are recorded in the Journal, but the Congressional Globe is quoted from, because it contains the details of the points raised with the decisions made and the debate thereon, instead of the Journal, which merely records the votes.

At the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress an amendment was added by the Senate to the sundry civil expenses appropriation bill increasing the pay of Senators and Representatives and taking effect retroactively from the beginning of that Congress. This amendment was disagreed to by the House of Representatives, but they amended other Senate amendments by the addition of a provision granting bounties to the soldiers of the war of the rebellion. Two committees of conference were unable to agree upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and when the second disagreement was recorded the Globe shows these proceedings occurred:

"Several SENATORS. What shall be done?

"Mr. SHERMAN. There is but one point of difficulty. The Senate conferees proposed to recede from the amendment in regard to the pay of members, but found that that was not at all in the way; that could be laid out of view: the only difficulty is in regard to the question of bounties. The House insist upon some legislation being had in regard to the bounties, and their conferees submitted a proposition which we did not feel at liberty to accept. I will say that the proposition submitted is much more moderate and much more reasonable than any I have yet seen; but we considered that the action of the Senate did not leave us at liberty to accept it." (Cong. Globe, Thirty-ninth Cong., 1st sess., pt. 5, p. 4246.)

And subsequently the Senator from Ohio suggested:

"The Senate may instruct the conferees." (Ibid., p. 4247.)

Whereupon Mr. Trumbull, then a Senator from Illinois, moved

"That the committee of conference be instructed to agree to that proposition of the House." (Ibid., p. 4247.)

Meaning the proposition which had been stated in detail by Mr. SHERMAN as having been made by the House conferees.

A modification of the terms of the proposition having been suggested by Mr. Doolittle, Mr. Trumbull said:

"The proper motion, I suppose would be to recommit the report to the committee with instructions to agree to that proposition." (Ibid., p. 4247.)

No point of order was raised, no doubt was suggested by any Senator as to the power of the body to instruct the conferees; and the motion having been stated, amendments to the instructions were moved, and finally, the question recurring on the motion of Mr. Trumbull, it was agreed to by a vote of yeas 23, nays 5. (Ibid., p. 4248.) And on the very same page of the Globe it appears that the conferees immediately made a report conformably to the instructions of the Senate, and it was agreed to and the bill disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have had this short congressional history, going back only a few years, read in order to show, as I think it ought to show, that both Houses had habitually instructed their conferees to insist upon or to agree to particular things. In this body it was done in form in that way. When my honorable friend from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] whose judgment upon such matters we all rely upon, determined that a motion was in order to instruct the conferees, his opinion was that it would change in some degree the character or the name of the conference. I do not agree to that reason which he gave for holding that the motion was in order, but he did hold that the motion itself was in order to instruct the conferees to insist upon a particular point. And the same occurred on the motion of Senator Trumbull—and I must speak tenderly of him because he is not here to defend himself—the very man who on the 3d of March, 1873, stood up to appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that point, who had a few years before himself made the very same motion to instruct a committee of conference on the part of the Senate. Undoubtedly the opinion of the honorable Senator from Illinois had undergone change; undoubtedly he had forgotten what he had himself moved a year or so before and what the Senate had unanimously agreed to, that we might instruct our own agents and representatives to insist upon particular points or particular topics, and the more so as he was about to retire to private life, where he would be no more vexed by questions of this difficult and complicated character. I have no criticism to make upon the apparent inconsistency of the position of the Senator from Illinois. It would neither be becoming nor fair, perhaps, to make any criticism upon it when he is not here to defend himself. I only mention the fact of history, that a few years before the time when the Senator from Illinois made the point of order that my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] could not move to instruct a committee of conference, he had himself made the same motion, which the Senate unanimously, by acquiescence and by suggestion, agreed was in order.

Now, it may be true that the only time when you cannot instruct a committee of conference, or your own representatives in that committee, is when your own salary is to be raised. Perhaps that is the parliamentary exception that has not appeared in the books and that ought to be made. It seems to me to be the only exception that ever has existed. So, Mr. President, I say in all seriousness that I believe that if the proposition of the Senator from Iowa, to take a distinct vote upon instructing the conferees about our own salaries, had been held by the Senate to be in order, our conferees would have been instructed to insist upon not increasing them; but not knowing the history of legislation and parliamentary order at that moment, according to what has been read from the desk, we made the mistake, as it appears to me, of determining that we were helpless and that we must go, as they used to say about the Oregon boundary, the whole figure or nothing. So, believing that if we could have had a fair and direct vote upon the single question proposed by the Senator from Iowa as to the increase of our own salaries it would have been rejected, I cannot help concluding that the Senate acted under a misapprehension, and passed this provision in that bill believing that it could not avoid passing it without defeating the bill altogether, and thus having all the appropriations for that branch of the public service fail.

Therefore, Mr. President, I conclude that we passed this unfortunate act under an entire misapprehension of our powers to protect the Treasury and the tax-payers against this foray made upon their resources; and for that reason I shall vote, if I have the opportunity, for a total and absolute repeal of everything that we did under that misapprehension.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of my friend from Illinois. I promised my friend from Pennsylvania, who yielded to me, that I would move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield the floor?

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I yield the floor. I did not rise to make a speech, but merely to make a suggestion, to correct a misapprehension that arose here yesterday in the Senate; but I can do it at another time.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave of all these Senators to occupy not more than half a minute by the watch to make one remark; and I do it merely that silence may not be taken as acquiescence in the parliamentary law which has been laid down by the Senator from Vermont. I wish, therefore, as one member of this body, to say, and to say in the presence of the record which the Senator has produced and which I have again traversed with my own eyes, that in my judgment nothing is clearer than that the Senate cannot, without a violation of parliamentary law, instruct the managers of a free conference. I think I can prove that that is the law in the judgment of those who made this record. But my present purpose is merely to file a caveat against what the Senator from Vermont again insists is the parliamentary law. I shall join him in voting for the total repeal of the bill in question; but I cannot do it for the reasons which in this respect he has assigned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to my friend for making that suggestion, which I anticipated that he would make because I know the clearness of his mind. But I beg leave to be allowed to suggest to him that while the reasons given by my honorable friend from Maine for his holding the motion in order would not sustain my position fully, yet he did hold the thing in order. When the House had requested a free conference in the ordinary form he did hold that it was in order to move to instruct those conferees to insist upon a particular thing or to agree to it, as I said.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to set him right, as I think I can, there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. In the first place, I deny that the House of Representatives in that case had asked a free conference. On the contrary, the House of Representatives, being the first of the two Houses to propose a conference, had expressly proposed such a conference as the honorable Senator from Maine, then in the chair, referred to; so that I deny that part of the premises of the Senator from Vermont.

In the next place, the then occupant of the chair, the Senator from Maine, held—and he had every treatise of parliamentary law at his back—that there are two utterly distinct species of conference, one a full and free conference, which in the British house was formerly held in the painted chamber, both houses attending and the delegates acting in their presence; and the other a simple, or, as the Senator from Maine there called it, a strict conference, which, as May and other parliamentary writers tell us, is nothing except a delegation sent by the two houses to meet each other and exchange express messages—"instructions" we call them. That the Senator from Maine ruled, and the Senate proceeded, the compiler of this record says, (not, as he supposes, because they thought anything was out of order or in order,) to reject the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio on that occasion.

Now, if my friend will pardon me as he has indulged me so far, I will add as to the other precedent in case of raising the pay of soldiers, a motion being made by the then Senator from Illinois, no point of order whatever was raised; it was done by unanimous consent, and, therefore, I did not make my remarks in regard to that; but in respect of the former precedent I must consider it one which was not in its beginning a full and free conference asked for by the House, and in which the Senator from Maine, then in the chair, explained the law precisely as I believe it to be, and the Senate then chose for some reason to refuse to order it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from New York has lost himself, as he might well, having the chief sea-port of the nation at his door, in a sea of terms. He is sailing in a sea of nomenclature, and has lost sight of the substance of these propositions. The question before the Senate was, in the first instance, when my friend from Maine ruled it—and you can go back to the message and see how it came from the House—whether the Senate had a right to instruct its conferees who were to go, not with the written instructions of a strict conference, as my friend stated, (in which case the conferees would have not a word to say for themselves, but would be only the bearers of a message half way, as your Secretary is the bearer of a message the whole way when we send him to the House of Representatives,) but conferees for the purpose of discussion, bound by certain rules; that is to say, bound by the will of the body that appointed them to go. That was the motion, and that was the decision. The Senator from Maine said that he considered such a motion to be in order because he thought it resulted in a simple conference. Enough of that now. Then let us go to the next precedent.

My honorable friend says that the motion of the late Senator from Illinois was made by unanimous consent, and agreed to by unanimous consent. Why, Mr. President, this affects the rights of the other House; nobody ever put it upon our own rights as among ourselves, because nobody yet ever questioned that, as it respected ourselves, we could instruct any committee to do anything that we commanded them to do; but it was in respect to the rights of the other body, and therefore unanimous consent, in my opinion, could not have come in. The Senate, by unanimous consent, as my friend truly says, that is to say, without dissent, and on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, who has now unhappily departed from us to private life, thought they could instruct our conferees in a free conference with the House to agree to pay certain bounties to the soldiers—that was the way it was put; and yet he appealed from the decision of the Chair a year ago, on the ground that we could not lawfully, with respect to the other House, instruct our agents to insist upon not increasing our own salaries for services already performed.

I think my friend from New York, in the candor that I know characterizes him, will see that there must be some force in that observation. And then when we go to the other House we find there a decision of the late Vice-President of the United States, who, on the occasion when this point was made last year, had just vacated the chair when the ruling by its temporary occupant was made, and whose opinion was understood by that occupant, I think I am safe in saying, as instructing him, that the law was clear, and that the motion was in order. But that has nothing to do with the present case. The Senator from Illinois asked the Senate, and the Senate sustained him in it, to say that upon parliamentary law we could not instruct our own agents to insist that the provision increasing our own salaries should be struck out of that bill.

I say, then, yielding entirely to the force of what my friend from New York has said as a technical argument as to the change of circumstances, that when you come to the meat of the thing, precisely the same question in all the cases has been determined, first by the House of Representatives, stated by its Speaker and universally acquiesced in when the point was raised, in terms that the House had the same power to instruct its committee of conference that it had to instruct any other committee; next by the Vice-President, now Senator from Maine, stating, without using the same terms, that a motion which was to instruct that committee was in order, although he gave a different reason for it, and one which has much force, but does not quiet commend itself to my own mind; and next the Senate, by unanimous consent, on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, instructed a free conference in the very sense of my friend from New York, as he will find by looking at the record of the House of Representatives, to insist upon a particular provision being put in or taken out; and after all this, I do say that we were acting under a misapprehension when we voted last year—a misapprehension of the history of the subject. I do not say it was owing to a want of judgment; but I say we had not in remembrance, at that time, the fact that the Senate had on two occasions and the House had upon one, then recent, done what to me appears to be the very same thing in substance and effect.

Now, Mr. President, unless my friend from New York wishes to make an observation, I move, in pursuance of my promise, not for the purpose of an adjournment, but to attend to public interests which are required to be considered in executive session, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will if my friend will renew it.

Mr. LOGAN. As I said, I do not rise for the purpose of continuing the discussion, but merely to call the attention of the Senate to one point.

In the debate yesterday I stated that the bill presented by the committee, using, perhaps, a strong term, was a deception, for the reason that it professed to repeal the law of the last session as far as we could go, and did not do it. I said that I did not make that remark in any offensive sense. I was corrected by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] he believing that I was mistaken, that it did include all. He referred me to the third section of the appropriation bill of last year, which applied to the heads of Bureaus and other employés in the Departments. My friend the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] in his seat assented to the proposition, saying "except the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court;" and that seemed to me to be the impression left on the Senate, that this bill did repeal all of the salary bill of last year saving the clauses affecting the President of the United States, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the other judges of that court. Now, in order to show that I was correct, and to correct the impression, not intentionally but unintentionally made on the Senate, that this bill did go as far as the other one did, I will read the amendment proposed by the committee of the Senate:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government, for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of members of Congress and the several officers and employés of either House of Congress, or both, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries and compensation of all said persons shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act.

No man will dispute that that applies solely to Congress and their subordinates. That is so, is it not?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The next position is—

That the compensation of the several heads of department shall be each $8,000 per annum.

That is the whole amendment. Now, the law that we passed last year provided for the increase of the compensation of members of Congress, of heads of Departments, of the Chief Justice and judges of the Supreme Court, of the President of the United States; and, further, "each assistant secretary of the Treasury, State, and Interior Departments shall receive a compensation, to be paid monthly, of $6,000 per annum." I said yesterday that this bill did not go that far, and that I desired to go the whole length of repeal, as far as we could constitutionally; and the impression was made on the Senate that the bill did go that far. Now, I call the attention of the Senate to the law that passed last session, and they will find that the assistant secretaries of the Departments were included in that bill, and that the third section referred to by the Senator from Ohio, which had been agreed to by Congress prior to that time, includes only the heads of the different Bureaus and the Commissioner of Agriculture.

My object in making the statement I did was to have this bill go as far as the law then went—to the extent that we could constitutionally carry the repeal. That kind of a bill I am willing to vote for, and that is what I think the people demand. I merely rose to make this correction.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate go into executive session.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me say one word, with the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I trust if the public interest is such that we should go into executive session now, as has been suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that, while of course I cannot bind any one, it will be with a distinct understanding that we stand by this bill to-night. I call upon the friends of the bill; I think the sooner we pass this bill or dispose of the question the better for us and for the country.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened; and (at four o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 6, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DAWES. I desire unanimous consent to change the reference of a bill which was yesterday referred, doubtless through inadvertency, to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was a bill to regulate the service and collection of customs and to repeal moieties, &c. It should have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. I ask that the change of reference be made.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection; and the change of reference was made.

TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. MCCRARY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1012) to regulate commerce by railroads among the several States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee with the understanding that it should not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

DESTITUTION IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. SYPHER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution which meets the approbation of the President and has his approval. I ask that it be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is known by well-authenticated reports, specifically brought to the capital by Rev. Bishop Wilmer, of Louisiana, that in certain localities in the South the people are destitute and in a condition of starvation, owing to the failure of the crops: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to direct the Secretary of War to issue army rations in such quantities as may be required to alleviate the immediate sufferings of the inhabitants of the destitute communities.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is a joint resolution, and contemplates action.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to it.

Mr. MAYNARD. This resolution should hardly be passed without some authentic statement upon which to base it. I suggest that it be referred to some committee with leave to report it back at any time.

Mr. SYPHER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will not object to this resolution, for when the people of Memphis were suffering——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] objects to its being adopted at this time, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] suggests its reference to a committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I move it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SYPHER. With leave to report it at any time.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

No objection was made; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 31) was accordingly received, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, with leave to the committee to report at any time.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. BOWEN. I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read, some joint resolutions of the State of Virginia.

The joint resolutions were read, as follows:

Joint resolutions reaffirming the third resolution of the conservative platform of 1873, and protesting against the passage of the civil-rights bill now pending in the Congress of the United States.

Resolved by the General Assembly of Virginia—

1. That the sentiments embodied in the third resolution of the platform of the conservative party of Virginia in the late election, ratified as they have been by an unprecedented popular majority, and commended to the favorable consideration of the General Assembly by the governor of Virginia in his inaugural message, be, and the same are hereby, reaffirmed; and this General Assembly doth declare that there is no purpose upon their part, or upon the part of the people they represent, to cherish capricious hostility to the present administration of the Federal Government, but that they will judge it impartially by its official acts, and will cordially co-operate in every measure of the administration which may be beneficent in its design, and calculated to promote the welfare of the people and cultivate sentiments of good-will between the different sections of the Union.

2. That this General Assembly recognize the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as a part of that instrument, and desire, in good faith, to abide by its provisions as expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States. That august tribunal recently held, after the most mature consideration, that it is only the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States that are placed by this clause under the protection of the Constitution, and that the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, "whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment," and that the "entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the State, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government."

3. That this amendment, thus construed by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, is the supreme law of the land; a law for rulers and people, and should be obeyed and respected by all the co-ordinate departments of the Government.

4. That the bill now before Congress, known as the civil-rights bill, is in violation of this amendment as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, is an infringement on the constitutional and legislative powers of the States, is sectional in its operation, and injurious alike to the white and colored population of the Southern States, "and that its enforced application in these States will prove destructive of their systems of education, arrest the enlightenment of the colored population in whose improvement the people of Virginia feel a lively interest, produce continual irritation between the races, counteract the pacification and development now happily progressing, repel immigration, greatly augment emigration, reopen wounds now almost healed, engender new political asperities, and paralyze the power and influence of the State government for duly controlling and promoting domestic interests and preserving internal harmony.

5. That the people of Virginia, through their representatives, enter their earnest and solemn protest against this bill, and instruct their Senators and request their Representatives in the Congress of the United States firmly, but respectfully, to oppose its passage, not only for the reasons herein expressed, but as a measure calculated to arrest the growing sentiments of concord and harmony between the Northern and Southern States of the Union.

6. That the Governor cause a copy of these resolutions to be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, with the request that they present the same in their respective bodies.

Agreed to by the Senate January 5, 1874.

SHELTON C. DAVIS, C. S.

Agreed to by the House of Delegates January, 5, 1874.

J. BELL BIGGER, C. H. D.

Mr. BOWEN. I move that these resolutions be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 32) in relation to the appointment of regents of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION CONTEST—BETHUNE vs. HARRIS.

Mr. LAMAR. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Elections to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the case of Marion Bethune, contesting the right of Henry R. Harris to a seat on the floor of this House as a Representative from the fourth congressional district of the State of Georgia.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAMAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights, upon which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DURHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE,] who desires to have an amendment printed.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to the civil-rights bill, and I ask that it be printed.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BECK. I ask my colleague to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I will do so.

Mr. BECK. I desire to offer an amendment to the civil-rights bill, and to have it printed. It is to add to section 1 the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to require hotel-keepers to put whites and blacks into the same rooms, or beds or feed them at the same table, nor to require that whites and blacks shall be put into the same rooms or classes at school, or the same boxes or seats at theaters, or the same berths on steamboats or other vessels, or the same lots in cemeteries.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSIER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I will do so, if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RANSIER,] after the gentleman from Kentucky has concluded.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the twenty minutes allotted to us in this debate it is impossible to fully discuss the provisions of this bill. Nearly the whole ground has been gone over by the gentlemen from Virginia, Georgia, and Texas, [Messrs. HARRIS, STEPHENS, and MILLS;] but the importance of this bill, and the evil effects its passage will produce to the district and State which I represent, is my only apology for now asking the attention of the House. The people of Kentucky have submitted quietly and without resistance to all the various amendments to the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed by Congress in relation to the institution of slavery, and by which they have been deprived of millions of property without compensation. Slaves were recognized by the Constitution as property, and under that instrument you could pass no law impairing the right of the holder of that kind of property without a just compensation. A constitutional amendment was necessary to emancipate the slave; and the thirteenth amendment was adopted. But after this amendment he was not a citizen; and to make him such the fourteenth amendment was adopted. This being done, he could not vote; and to enfranchise him the fifteenth amendment was adopted. So that it has required three amendments to the Constitution to enfranchise him.

You could not reach this result by simple congressional enactments; and, although the bill now under consideration has been reported by the Law Committee of this House, I do not believe that it is constitutional. I do not believe that Congress has any right, under any or either of these amendments, to pass any such law. Congress had as much right to pass a law enfranchising the freedman before the adoption of the fifteenth amendment as it has to pass this bill; and yet, as before stated, no attempt was made to enfranchise him until after that amendment, because that amendment was necessary to accomplish that result. I believe the matters and things embraced in this bill are alone the subject of State legislation. I do not believe they are embraced in any of the powers delegated to the General Government.

The passage of this bill will override that provision of the Constitution, which declares—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

It interferes with State-rights and State sovereignty; and against this system of legislation I enter my solemn protest. We have no more right or power to say who shall enter a theater or a hotel and be accommodated therein than to say who shall enter a man's private house or enter into any social amusement to pass away an evening's hour. We have no more right to say that a particular class of individuals shall have access to our public schools, when those individuals have not contributed to the support of those schools, than we have to say that they shall have access to private schools. These are matters purely of local legislation or of private contract.

I know, Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes hard to determine what are the powers of the General Government; how far they extend, and where the jurisdiction and power of the States begin; and we sometimes overlook the fact that there is a citizenship of the State as well as a citizenship of the United States. Now, my idea is, if the citizen of the State should be protected in his rights and immunities, (I mean those which are fundamental,) he has no right to complain, and Congress has no right to interfere in the matter unless some of his political rights secured by the Constitution are abridged or interfered with. I think this position is sustained by several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. That court, in the Slaughter-house cases, lately decided and reported in 16 Wallace, on pages 75 and 76, speaking of these privileges and immunities and the clause of the Constitution securing them, says:

Fortunately we are not without judicial construction of this clause of the Constitution. The first and the leading case on the subject is that of Corfield vs. Corgill, decided by Mr. Justice Washington in the circuit court for the district of Pennsylvania in 1823. (4 Washington's Circuit Court, 371.)

"The inquiry," he says, "is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are fundamental, which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may all, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject nevertheless to such restraints as the Government may prescribe for the general good of the whole."

With this definition of the rights and immunities of citizens, can it be claimed that there is any citizen or class of citizens in Kentucky who are not protected by the State with the "right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety?"

The court, in these same cases, in the same book, on page 74, goes on to speak of the citizenship of the State and the citizenship of the United States thus:

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the word citizen of the State should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

It cannot be claimed by the friends of this bill that they have the right to pass the same to define what are the implied rights guaranteed under the Constitution. In the case of Crandall vs. Nevada, 6 Wallace, page 36, the court defines what those implied rights are, thus:

It is said to be the right of the citizen of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution, to come to the seat of Government to assert any claim he may have with it; to seek its protection; to share its offices; to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its seaports through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted; to the sub-treasuries, land-offices, and courts of justice in the several States.

I assert here that no citizen of the district I represent is deprived of any of these privileges. I do not believe it was the intention of those who framed the Constitution and the amendments to give Congress power over civil rights in the States, or to deprive the States of those rights. In these Slaughter-house cases, on pages 77, 78, the court, to my mind, settles this whole controversy thus:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority, that up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States as above defined lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government?

And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound.

For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress, whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper, on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment.

The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of power heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed the amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Much more from the same opinion bearing on this question could be quoted, but the above is sufficient.

This much as to the right of Congress to pass this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words as to the effect the passage of this bill will have upon the people I represent. As before said, the slave has been made a freedman—been made a citizen and enfranchised. These are political rights. The State which I in part represent protects him in the enjoyment of these rights, and I do not know of any man in my district who desires to interfere with those rights. But, sir, when you undertake to legislate as to the civil and social relations of the races, then you will have aroused and embittered the feelings of the Anglo-Saxon race to such an extent that it will be hard to control them. The poorest and humblest white person in my district feels and knows that he or she belongs to a superior race morally and intellectually, and nothing is so revolting to them as social equality with this inferior race. They will treat the freedman kindly, but socially hold aloof from him, as belonging to an inferior race. You may say these are not social relations provided for in this bill; but, sir, if I am compelled to sit side by side with him in the theater, the stage-coach, and the railroad car, to eat with him at the same table at the hotels, and my child to be educated at the same schools with his child—if these are not social relations I do not understand them.

To my mind, the most objectionable part of this bill is that which forces the children of freedmen into our common schools. The State of Kentucky in her liberality has provided a good system of common schools, which is supported by a direct tax upon the property of the white people of that State; and there are hundreds of poor children in my district, and thousands in Kentucky, who receive in these schools all the education they ever get; and they look upon this privilege as the greatest boon which an enlightened Legislature could confer upon them. Should this bill pass, and the children of freedmen demand admission into these schools, I believe the system in Kentucky will be so injured as to become worthless, and the thousands of children who thus receive a good common-school education, and who are unable to pay in the private schools, will go uneducated. Poor as they are, they will not accept of an education upon such degrading terms. I want to see the children of freedmen educated; and I believe if the people of Kentucky are let alone they will provide a way to educate them to themselves in separate schools. They are not taxed one cent to support our schools now. As far back as February, 1866, the Legislature of Kentucky provided that all the taxes collected from freedmen should go to the support of their paupers and the education of their children. The first and fourth sections of said act read as follows:

SECTION 1. That all the taxes hereafter collected from the negroes and mulattoes in this Commonwealth shall be set apart and constitute a separate fund for their use and benefit; one-half, if necessary, to go to the support of their paupers, and the remainder to the education of their children.

SEC. 4. The trustees of each school district in this Commonwealth may cause a separate school to be taught in their district for the education of the negro and mulatto children in said district, to be conducted and reported as other schools are, upon which they shall receive their proportion of the fund set apart in this act for that purpose.

The whole of the taxes of the freedmen of Kentucky go to support their own paupers and the education of their own children, and they contribute nothing to the support of the State government. They are protected in their lives, liberties, and in the pursuit of happiness at the expense of the white people. They are protected in all of their political rights without the payment of one farthing to secure that protection. There are hundreds of paupers in that State supported out of the various county treasuries, because their own funds are insufficient to support them. The insane are sent to one of our lunatic asylums and taken care of, and the expense paid out of the public treasury, which is filled alone by taxes, &c., levied upon the property of the white people of the State. Under the provisions of the above act separate schools have been organized and taught for the children of freedmen in many parts of Kentucky; and if we are let alone I believe our people will provide some way to educate them generally. I believe the passage of this bill will so embitter the white people of Kentucky that it will retard, rather than forward, the educational advantages of the blacks. I believe it will destroy our whole common-school system.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the house who are pressing this bill to pause and reflect upon the consequences which must result from its passage. I ask them not thus to strike down and override the reserved rights of the States. I ask, in behalf of the white children of my district, not thus to destroy the only means they have to acquire an education. I ask, in behalf of every white person in my district, that you do not force upon them the degrading provisions of this bill. I ask you now, when the two races are living quietly together in the same State, not to pass a law, the effect of which will do more than anything else to disturb that quiet, perhaps ending in a war of the races; and when that occurs, the black race in this country will be exterminated. I shall, to avert some of the evil consequences of this bill, propose the following amendment, to come in at the end of section 1:

But should the trustees or other persons having control over the free or common schools in their respective districts cause to be taught a separate school in said district for the negro and mulatto children therein for the same length of time the other free or common school is taught, then said negroes or mulattoes shall have no right under this bill to admission to or accommodation in schools wherein white children are taught.

Mr. ELLIOTT obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. RANSIER. I desire to give notice, that at the proper time I propose to offer the following additional section, which I ask to have printed:

That no citizen possessing all qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as juror in any court, national or State, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with the duty of the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the reasons above named shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000; and any discrimination against any citizen on account of color, by use of the word "white" in any law, statute, ordinance, or regulation, national or State, is hereby repealed.

Mr. LOWNDES. I desire to have the following amendment printed: Add to section 1 the following:

Provided, That where separate schools are provided for white and colored children, the children of each race shall have admission only to the schools for that race.

Mr. KNAPP. I desire to have read an amendment which I propose to offer whenever the opportunity may be presented.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States, when made by any person in good faith according to the statute in such cases made and provided, without distinction of race or color, shall prima facie entitle such person to the protection of the Government of the United States; and when desiring temporarily to absent himself from the territorial area of this Government, to the proper passports, fully guaranteeing such protection in all respects as though he had been regularly naturalized; and all laws and parts of laws or regulations in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed and rescinded.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to give notice of my intention to offer the following amendment:

Strike out in lines 12 and 13 the words "because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and insert "alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States according to existing laws or other person within the jurisdiction of any State."

Mr. ELLIOTT. While I am sincerely grateful for this high mark of courtesy that has been accorded to me by this House, it is a matter of regret to me that it is necessary at this day that I should rise in the presence of an American Congress to advocate a bill which simply asserts equal rights and equal public privileges for all classes of American citizens. I regret, sir, that the dark hue of my skin may lend a color to the imputation that I am controlled by motives personal to myself in my advocacy of this great measure of national justice. Sir, the motive that impels me is restricted by no such narrow boundary, but is as broad as your Constitution. I advocate it, sir, because it is right. The bill, however, not only appeals to your justice, but it demands a response from your gratitude.

In the events that led to the achievement of American Independence the negro was not an inactive or unconcerned spectator. He bore his part bravely upon many battle-fields, although uncheered by that certain hope of political elevation which victory would secure to the white man. The tall granite shaft, which a grateful State has reared above its sons who fell in defending Fort Griswold against the attack of Benedict Arnold, bears the name of Jordan, Freeman, and other brave men of the African race who there cemented with their blood the corner-stone of the Republic. In the State which I have the honor in part to represent the rifle of the black man rang out against the troops of the British crown in the darkest days of the American Revolution. Said General Greene, who has been justly termed the Washington of the North, in a letter written by him to Alexander Hamilton, on the 10th day of January, 1781, from the vicinity of Camden, South Carolina:

There is no such thing as national character or national sentiment. The inhabitants are numerous, but they would be rather formidable abroad than at home. There is a great spirit of enterprise among the black people, and those that come out as volunteers are not a little formidable to the enemy.

At the battle of New Orleans, under the immortal Jackson, a colored regiment held the extreme right of the American line unflinchingly, and drove back the British column that pressed upon them, at the point of the bayonet. So marked was their valor on that occasion that it evoked from their great commander the warmest encomiums, as will be seen from his dispatch announcing the brilliant victory.

As the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who seems to be the leading exponent on this floor of the party that is arrayed against the principle of this bill, has been pleased, in season and out of season, to cast odium upon the negro and to vaunt the chivalry of his State, I may be pardoned for calling attention to another portion of the same dispatch. Referring to the various regiments under his command, and their conduct on that field which terminated the second war of American Independence, General Jackson says:

At the very moment when the entire discomfiture of the enemy was looked for with a confidence amounting to certainty, the Kentucky re-enforcements, in whom so much reliance had been placed, ingloriously fled.

In quoting this indisputable piece of history, I do so only by way of admonition and not to question the well-attested gallantry of the true Kentuckian, and to suggest to the gentleman that it would be well that he should not flaunt his heraldry so proudly while he bears this bar-sinister on the military escutcheon of his State—a State which answered the call of the Republic in 1861, when treason thundered at the very gates of the capital, by coldly declaring her neutrality in the impending struggle. The negro, true to that patriotism and love of country that have ever characterized and marked his history on this continent, came to the aid of the Government in its efforts to maintain the Constitution. To that Government he now appeals; that Constitution he now invokes for protection against outrage and unjust prejudices founded upon caste.

But, sir, we are told by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that Congress has no power under the Constitution to pass such a law, and that the passage of such an act is in direct contravention of the rights of the States. I cannot assent to any such proposition. The constitution of a free government ought always to be construed in favor of human rights. Indeed, the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, in positive words, invest Congress with the power to protect the citizen in his civil and political rights. Now, sir, what are civil rights? Rights natural, modified by civil society. Mr. Lieber says:

By civil liberty is meant, not only the absence of individual restraint, but liberty within the social system and political organism—a combination of principles and laws which acknowledge, protect, and favor the dignity of man. * * * Civil liberty is the result of man's two-fold character as an individual and social being, so soon as both are equally respected.—Lieber on Civil Liberty, page 25.

Alexander Hamilton, the right-hand man of Washington in the perilous days of the then infant Republic, the great interpreter and expounder of the Constitution, says:

Natural liberty is a gift of the beneficent Creator to the whole human race; civil liberty is founded on it; civil liberty is only natural liberty modified and secured by civil society.—Hamilton's History of the American Republic, vol, 1, page 70.

In the French constitution of June, 1793, we find this grand and noble declaration:

Government is instituted to insure to man the free use of his natural and inalienable rights. These rights are equality, liberty, security, property. All men are equal by nature and before the law. * * * Law is the same for all, be it protective or penal. Freedom is the power by which man can do what does not interfere with the rights of another; its basis is nature, its standard is justice, its protection is law, its moral boundary is the maxim: "Do not unto others what you do not wish they should do unto you."

Are we then, sir, with the amendments to our Constitution staring us in the face; with these grand truths of history before our eyes; with innumerable wrongs daily inflicted upon five million citizens demanding redress, to commit this question to the diversity of State legislation? In the words of Hamilton—

Is it the interest of the Government to sacrifice individual rights to the preservation of the rights of an artificial being, called States? There can be no truer principle than this, that every individual of the community at large has an equal right to the protection of Government. Can this be a free Government if partial distinctions are tolerated or maintained?

The rights contended for in this bill are among "the sacred rights of mankind, which are not to be rummaged for among old parchments or musty records; they are written as with a sunbeam, in the whole volume of human nature, by the hand of the Divinity itself, and can never be erased or obscured by mortal power."

But the Slaughter-house cases!—the Slaughter-house cases!

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, always swift to sustain the failing and dishonored cause of proscription, rushes forward and flaunts in our faces the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Slaughter-house cases, and in that act he has been willingly aided by the gentleman from Georgia. Hitherto, in the contests which have marked the progress of the cause of equal civil rights, our opponents have appealed sometimes to custom, sometimes to prejudice, more often to pride of race, but they have never sought to shield themselves behind the Supreme Court. But now, for the first time, we are told that we are barred by a decision of that court, from which there is no appeal. If this be true we must stay our hands. The cause of equal civil rights must pause at the command of a power whose edicts must be obeyed till the fundamental law of our country is changed.

Has the honorable gentleman from Kentucky considered well the claim he now advances? If it were not disrespectful I would ask, has he ever read the decision which he now tells us is an insuperable barrier to the adoption of this great measure of justice?

In the consideration of this subject, has not the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia been warped by the ghost of the dead doctrines of State-rights? Has he been altogether free from prejudices engendered by long training in that school of politics that well-nigh destroyed this Government?

Mr. Speaker, I venture to say here in the presence of the gentleman from Kentucky, and the gentleman from Georgia, and in the presence of the whole country, that there is not a line or word, not a thought or dictum even, in the decision of the Supreme Court in the great Slaughter-house cases which casts a shadow of doubt on the right of Congress to pass the pending bill, or to adopt such other legislation as it may judge proper and necessary to secure perfect equality before the law to every citizen of the Republic. Sir, I protest against the dishonor now cast upon our Supreme Court by both the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Georgia. In other days, when the whole country was bowing beneath the yoke of slavery, when press, pulpit, platform, Congress, and courts felt the fatal power of the slave oligarchy, I remember a decision of that court which no American now reads without shame and humiliation. But those days are past. The Supreme Court of to-day is a tribunal as true to freedom as any department of this Government, and I am honored with the opportunity of repelling a deep disgrace which the gentleman from Kentucky, backed and sustained as he is by the gentleman from Georgia, seeks to put upon it.

What were these Slaughter-house cases? The gentleman should be aware that a decision of any court should be examined in the light of the exact question which is brought before it for decision. That is all that gives authority to any decision.

The State of Louisiana, by act of her Legislature, had conferred on certain persons the exclusive right to maintain stock-landings and slaughter-houses within the city of New Orleans, or the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard, in that State. The corporation which was thereby chartered were invested with the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock, landing, and slaughter-house business within the limits designated.

The supreme court of Louisana sustained the validity of the act conferring these exclusive privileges, and the plaintiffs in error brought the case before the Supreme Court of the United States for review. The plaintiffs in error contended that the act in question was void, because, first, it established a monopoly which was in derogation of common right and in contravention of the common law; and, second, that the grant of such exclusive privileges was in violation of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

It thus appears from a simple statement of the case that the question which was before the court was not whether a State law which denied to a particular portion of her citizens the rights conferred on her citizens generally, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, was unconstitutional because in conflict with the recent amendments, but whether an act which conferred on certain citizens exclusive privileges for police purposes was in conflict therewith, because imposing an involuntary servitude forbidden by the thirteenth amendment, or abridging the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States, or denying the equal protection of the laws, prohibited by the fourteenth amendment.

On the part of the defendants in error it was maintained that the act was the exercise of the ordinary and unquestionable power of the State to make regulation for the health and comfort of society—the exercise of the police power of the State, defined by Chancellor Kent to be "the right to interdict unwholesome trades, slaughter-houses, operations offensive to the senses, the deposit of powder, the application of steam-power to propel cars, the building with combustible materials, and the burial of the dead in the midst of dense masses of population, on the general and rational principle that every person ought so to use his own property as not to injure his neighbors, and that private interests must be made subservient to the general interests of the community."

The decision of the Supreme Court is to be found in the 16th volume of Wallace's Reports, and was delivered by Associate Justice Miller. The court hold, first, that the act in question is a legitimate and warrantable exercise of the police power of the State in regulating the business of stock-landing and slaughtering in the city of New Orleans and the territory immediately contiguous. Having held this, the court proceeds to discuss the question whether the conferring of exclusive privileges, such as those conferred by the act in question, is the imposing of an involuntary servitude, the abridging of the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States, or the denial to any person within the jurisdiction of the State of the equal protection of the laws.

That the act is not the imposition of an involuntary servitude the court hold to be clear, and they next proceed to examine the remaining questions arising under the fourteenth amendment. Upon this question the court hold that the leading and comprehensive purpose of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments was to secure the complete freedom of the race, which, by the events of the war, had been wrested from the unwilling grasp of their owners. I know no finer or more just picture, albeit painted in the neutral tints of true judicial impartiality, of the motives and events which led to these amendments. Has the gentleman from Kentucky read these passages which I now quote? Or has the gentleman from Georgia considered well the force of the language therein used? Says the court on page 70:

> The process of restoring to their proper relations with the Federal Government and with the other States those which had sided with the rebellion, undertaken under the proclamation of President Johnson in 1865, and before the assembling of Congress, developed the fact that, notwithstanding the formal recognition by those States of the abolition of slavery, the condition of the slave race would, without further protection of the Federal Government, be almost as bad as it was before. Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal Government, were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty, and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value, while they had lost the protection which they had received from their former owners from motives both of interest and humanity.
> They were in some States forbidden to appear in the towns in any other character than menial servants. They were required to reside on and cultivate the soil, without the right to purchase or own it. They were excluded from any occupations of gain, and were not permitted to give testimony in the courts in any case where a white man was a party. It was said that their lives were at the mercy of bad men, either because the laws for their protection were insufficient or were not enforced.
> These circumstances, whatever of falsehood or misconception may have been mingled with their presentation, forced upon the statesmen who had conducted the Federal Government in safety through the crisis of the rebellion, and who supposed that by the thirteenth article of amendment they had secured the result of their labors, the conviction that something more was necessary in the way of constitutional protection to the unfortunate race who had suffered so much. They accordingly passed through Congress the proposition for the fourteenth amendment, and they declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the Government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection until they ratified that article by a formal vote of their legislative bodies.
> Before we proceed to examine more critically the provisions of this amendment, on which the plaintiffs in error rely, let us complete and dismiss the history of the recent amendments, as that history relates to the general purpose which pervades them all. A few years' experience satisfied the thoughtful men who had been the authors of the other two amendments that, notwithstanding the restraints of those articles on the States and the laws passed under the additional powers granted to Congress, these were inadequate for the protection of life, liberty, and property, without which freedom to the slave was no boon. They were in all those States denied the right of suffrage. The laws were administered by the white man alone. It was urged that a race of men distinctively marked as was the negro, living in the midst of another and dominant race, could never be fully secured in their person and their property without the right of suffrage.
> Hence the fifteenth amendment, which declares that "the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The negro having, by the fourteenth amendment, been declared to be a citizen of the United States, is thus made a voter in every State of the Union.
> We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all, and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the fifteenth amendment in terms mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them, as the fifteenth.

These amendments, one and all, are thus declared to have as their all-pervading design and end the security to the recently enslaved race, not only their nominal freedom, but their complete protection from those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over them. It is in this broad light that all these amendments must be read, the purpose to secure the perfect equality before the law of all citizens of the United States. What you give to one class you must give to all; what you deny to one class you shall deny to all, unless in the exercise of the common and universal police power of the State you find it needful to confer exclusive privileges on certain citizens, to be held and exercised still for the common good of all.

Such are the doctrines of the Slaughter-house cases—doctrines worthy of the Republic, worthy of the age, worthy of the great tribunal which thus loftily and impressively enunciates them. Do they—I put it to any man, be he lawyer or not; I put it to the gentleman from Georgia—do they give color even to the claim that this Congress may not now legislate against a plain discrimination made by State laws or State customs against that very race for whose complete freedom and protection these great amendments were elaborated and adopted? Is it pretended, I ask the honorable gentleman from Kentucky or the honorable gentleman from Georgia—is it pretended anywhere that the evils of which we complain, our exclusion from the public inn, from the saloon and table of the steamboat, from the sleeping-coach on the railway, from the right of sepulture in the public burial-ground, are an exercise of the police power of the State? Is such oppression and injustice nothing but the exercise by the State of the right to make regulations for the health, comfort; and security of all her citizens? Is it merely enacting that one man shall so use his own as not to injure another's? Are the colored race to be assimilated to an unwholesome trade or to combustible materials, to be interdicted, to be shut up within prescribed limits? Let the gentleman from Kentucky or the gentleman from Georgia answer. Let the country know to what extent even the audacious prejudice of the gentleman from Kentucky will drive him, and how far even the gentleman from Georgia will permit himself to be led captive by the unrighteous teachings of a false political faith.

If we are to be likened in legal view to "unwholesome trades," to "large and offensive collections of animals," to "noxious slaughter-houses," to "the offal and stench which attend on certain manufactures," let it be avowed. If that is still the doctrine of the political party to which the gentlemen belong, let it be put upon record. If State laws which deny us the common rights and privileges of other citizens, upon no possible or conceivable ground save one of prejudice, or of "taste," as the gentleman from Texas termed it, and as I suppose the gentlemen will prefer to call it, are to be placed under the protection of a decision which affirms the right of a State to regulate the police of her great cities, then the decision is in conflict with the bill before us. No man will dare maintain such a doctrine. It is as shocking to the legal mind as it is offensive to the heart and conscience of all who love justice or respect manhood. I am astonished that the gentleman from Kentucky or the gentleman from Georgia should have been so grossly misled as to rise here and assert that the decision of the Supreme Court in these cases was a denial to Congress of the power to legislate against discriminations on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, because that court has decided that exclusive privileges conferred for the common protection of the lives and health of the whole community are not in violation of the recent amendments. The only ground upon which the grant of exclusive privileges to a portion of the community is ever defended is that the substantial good of all is promoted; that in truth it is for the welfare of the whole community that certain persons should alone pursue certain occupations. It is not the special benefit conferred on the few that moves the legislature, but the ultimate and real benefit of all, even of those who are denied the right to pursue those specified occupations. Does the gentleman from Kentucky say that my good is promoted when I am excluded from the public inn? Is the health or safety of the community promoted? Doubtless his prejudice is gratified. Doubtless his democratic instincts are pleased; but will he or his able coadjutor say that such exclusion is a lawful exercise of the police power of the State, or that it is not a denial to me of the equal protection of the laws? They will not so say.

But each of these gentlemen quote at some length from the decision of the court to show that the court recognizes a difference between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of the States. That is true, and no man here who supports this bill questions or overlooks the difference. There are privileges and immunities which belong to me as a citizen of the United States, and there are other privileges and immunities which belong to me as a citizen of my State. The former are under the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the latter are under the protection of the constitution and laws of my State. But what of that? Are the rights which I now claim—the right to enjoy the common public conveniences of travel on public highways, of rest and refreshment at public inns, of education in public schools, of burial in public cemeteries—rights which I hold as a citizen of the United States or of my State? Or, to state the question more exactly, is not the denial of such privileges to me a denial to me of the equal protection of the laws? For it is under this clause of the fourteenth amendment that we place the present bill, no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." No matter, therefore, whether his rights are held under the United States or under his particular State, he is equally protected by this amendment. He is always and everywhere entitled to the equal protection of the laws. All discrimination is forbidden; and while the rights of citizens of a State as such are not defined or conferred by the Constitution of the United States, yet all discrimination, all denial of equality before the law, all denial of the equal protection of the laws, whether State or national laws, is forbidden.

The distinction between the two kinds of citizenship is clear, and the Supreme Court have clearly pointed out this distinction, but they have nowhere written a word or line which denies to Congress the power to prevent a denial of equality of rights, whether those rights exist by virtue of citizenship of the United States or of a State. Let honorable members mark well this distinction. There are rights which are conferred on us by the United States. There are other rights conferred on us by the States of which we are individually the citizens. The fourteenth amendment does not forbid a State to deny to all its citizens any of those rights which the State itself has conferred, with certain exceptions, which are pointed out in the decision which we are examining. What it does forbid is inequality, is discrimination, or, to use the words of the amendment itself, is the denial "to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." If a State denies to me rights which are common to all her other citizens, she violates this amendment, unless she can show, as was shown in the Slaughter-house cases, that she does it in the legitimate exercise of her police power. If she abridges the rights of all her citizens equally, unless those rights are specially guarded by the Constitution of the United States, she does not violate this amendment. This is not to put the rights which I hold by virtue of my citizenship of South Carolina under the protection of the national Government; it is not to blot out or overlook in the slightest particular the distinction between rights held under the United States and rights held under the States; but it seeks to secure equality, to prevent discrimination, to confer as complete and ample protection on the humblest as on the highest.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in the course of the speech to which I am now replying, made a reference to the State of Massachusetts which betrays again the confusion which exists in his mind on this precise point. He tells us that Massachusetts excludes from the ballot-box all who cannot read and write, and points to that fact as the exercise of a right which this bill would abridge or impair. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] answered him truly and well, but I submit that he did not make the best reply. Why did he not ask the gentleman from Kentucky if Massachusetts had ever discriminated against any of her citizens on account of color, or race, or previous condition of servitude? When did Massachusetts sully her proud record by placing on her statute-book any law which admitted to the ballot the white man and shut out the black man? She has never done it; she will not do it; she cannot do it so long as we have a Supreme Court which reads the Constitution of our country with the eyes of justice; nor can Massachusetts or Kentucky deny to any man, on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, that perfect equality of protection under the laws so long as Congress shall exercise the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the great and unquestionable securities embodied in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

But, sir, a few words more as to the suffrage regulation of Massachusetts.

It is true that Massachusetts in 1857, finding that her illiterate population was being constantly augmented by the continual influx of ignorant emigrants, placed in her constitution the least possible limitation consistent with manhood suffrage to stay this tide of foreign ignorance. Its benefit has been fully demonstrated in the intelligent character of the voters of that honored Commonwealth, reflected so conspicuously in the able Representatives she has to-day upon this floor. But neither is the inference of the gentleman from Kentucky legitimate, nor do the statistics of the census of 1870, drawn from his own State, sustain his astounding assumption. According to the statistics we find the whole white population of that State is 1,098,692; the whole colored population 222,210. Of the whole white population who cannot write we find 201,077; of the whole colored population who cannot write, 126,048; giving us, as will be seen, 96,162 colored persons who can write to 897,615 white persons who can write. Now, the ratio of the colored population to the white is as 1 to 5, and the ratio of the illiterate colored population to the whole colored population is as 1 to 2; the ratio of the illiterate white population is to the whole white population as 1 is to 5. Reducing this, we have only a preponderance of three-tenths in favor of the whites as to literacy, notwithstanding the advantages which they have always enjoyed and do now enjoy of free-school privileges, and this, too, taking solely into account the single item of being unable to write; for with regard to the inability to read, there is no discrimination in the statistics between the white and colored population. There is, moreover, a peculiar felicity in these statistics with regard to the State of Kentucky, quoted so opportunely for me by the honorable gentleman; for I find that the population of that State, both with regard to its white and colored populations, bears the same relative rank in regard to the white and colored populations of the United States; and, therefore, while one negro would be disfranchised were the limitation of Massachusetts put in force, nearly three white men would at the same time be deprived of the right of suffrage—a consummation which I think would be far more acceptable to the colored people of that State than to the whites.

Now, sir, having spoken as to the intention of the prohibition imposed by Massachusetts, I may be pardoned for a slight inquiry as to the effect of this prohibition. First, it did not in any way abridge or curtail the exercise of the suffrage by any person who at that time enjoyed such right. Nor did it discriminate between the illiterate native and the illiterate foreigner. Being enacted for the good of the entire Commonwealth, like all just laws, its obligations fell equally and impartially upon all its citizens. And as a justification for such a measure, it is a fact too well known almost for mention here that Massachusetts had, from the beginning of her history, recognized the inestimable value of an educated ballot, by not only maintaining a system of free schools, but also enforcing an attendance thereupon, as one of the safeguards for the preservation of a real republican form of government. Recurring then, sir, to the possible contingency alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky, should the State of Kentucky, having first established a system of common schools whose doors shall swing open freely to all, as contemplated by the provisions of this bill, adopt a provision similar to that of Massachusetts, no one would have cause justly to complain. And if in the coming years the result of such legislation should produce a constituency rivaling that of the old Bay State, no one would be more highly gratified than I.

Mr. Speaker, I have neither the time nor the inclination to notice the many illogical and forced conclusions, the numerous transfers of terms, or the vulgar insinuations which further incumber the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky. Reason and argument are worse than wasted upon those who meet every demand for political and civil liberty by such ribaldry as this—extracted from the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky:

> I suppose there are gentlemen on this floor who would arrest, imprison, and fine a young woman in any State of the South if she were to refuse to marry a negro man on account of color, race, or previous condition of servitude, in the event of his making her a proposal of marriage, and her refusing on that ground. That would be depriving him of a right he had under the amendment, and Congress would be asked to take it up and say, "This insolent white woman must be taught to know that it is a misdemeanor to deny a man marriage because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude;" and Congress will be urged to say after a while that that sort of thing must be put a stop to, and your conventions of colored men will come here asking you to enforce that right.

Now, sir, recurring to the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who has added his remonstrance against the passage of this bill, permit me to say that I share in the feeling of high personal regard for that gentleman which pervades this House. His years, his ability, and his long experience in public affairs entitle him to the measure of consideration which has been accorded to him on this floor. But in this discussion I cannot and I will not forget that the welfare and rights of my whole race in this country are involved. When, therefore, the honorable gentleman from Georgia lends his voice and influence to defeat this measure, I do not shrink from saying that it is not from him that the American House of Representatives should take lessons in matters touching human rights or the joint relations of the State and national governments. While the honorable gentleman contented himself with harmless speculations in his study, or in the columns of a newspaper, we might well smile at the impotence of his efforts to turn back the advancing tide of opinion and progress; but, when he comes again upon this national arena, and throws himself with all his power and influence across the path which leads to the full enfranchisement of my race, I meet him only as an adversary; nor shall age or any other consideration restrain me from saying that he now offers this Government, which he has done his utmost to destroy, a very poor return for its magnanimous treatment, to come here and seek to continue, by the assertion of doctrines obnoxious to the true principles of our Government, the burdens and oppressions which rest upon five millions of his countrymen who never failed to lift their earnest prayers for the success of this Government when

Sir, it is scarcely twelve years since that gentleman shocked the civilized world by announcing the birth of a government which rested on human slavery as its corner-stone. The progress of events has swept away that pseudo-government which rested on greed, pride, and tyranny; and the race whom he then ruthlessly spurned and trampled on are here to meet him in debate, and to demand that the rights which are enjoyed by their former oppressors—who vainly sought to overthrow a Government which they could not prostitute to the base uses of slavery—shall be accorded to those who even in the darkness of slavery kept their allegiance true to freedom and the Union. Sir, the gentleman from Georgia has learned much since 1861; but he is still a laggard. Let him put away entirely the false and fatal theories which have so greatly marred an otherwise enviable record. Let him accept, in its fullness and beneficence, the great doctrine that American citizenship carries with it every civil and political right which manhood can confer. Let him lend his influence, with all his masterly ability, to complete the proud structure of legislation which makes this nation worthy of the great declaration which heralded its birth, and he will have done that which will most nearly redeem his reputation in the eyes of the world, and best vindicate the wisdom of that policy which has permitted him to regain his seat upon this floor.

To the diatribe of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who spoke on yesterday, and who so far transcended the limits of decency and propriety as to announce upon this floor that his remarks were addressed to white men alone, I shall have no word of reply. Let him feel that a negro was not only too magnanimous to smite him in his weakness, but was even charitable enough to grant him the mercy of his silence. [Laughter and applause on the floor and in the galleries.] I shall, sir, leave to others less charitable the unenviable and fatiguing task of sifting out of that mass of chaff the few grains of sense that may, perchance, deserve notice. Assuring the gentleman that the negro in this country aims at a higher degree of intellect than that exhibited by him in this debate, I cheerfully commend him to the commiseration of all intelligent men the world over—black men as well as white men.

Sir, equality before the law is now the broad, universal, glorious rule and mandate of the Republic. No State can violate that. Kentucky and Georgia may crowd their statute-books with retrograde and barbarous legislation; they may rejoice in the odious eminence of their consistent hostility to all the great steps of human progress which have marked our national history since slavery tore down the stars and stripes on Fort Sumter; but, if Congress shall do its duty, if Congress shall enforce the great guarantees which the Supreme Court has declared to be the one pervading purpose of all the recent amendments, then their unwise and unenlightened conduct will fall with the same weight upon the gentlemen from those States who now lend their influence to defeat this bill, as upon the poorest slave who once had no rights which the honorable gentlemen were bound to respect.

But, sir, not only does the decision in the Slaughter-house cases contain nothing which suggests a doubt of the power of Congress to pass the pending bill, but it contains an express recognition and affirmance of such power. I quote now from page 81 of the volume:

> "Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."
> In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.
> If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then, by the fifth section of the article of amendment, Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other. But as it is a State that is to be dealt with, and not alone the validity of its laws, we may safely leave that matter until Congress shall have exercised its power, or some case of State oppression, by denial of equal justice in its courts shall, have claimed a decision at our hands.

No language could convey a more complete assertion of the power of Congress over the subject embraced in the present bill than is here expressed. If the States do not conform to the requirements of this clause, if they continue to deny to any person within their jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, or as the Supreme Court had said, "deny equal justice in its courts," then Congress is here said to have power to enforce the constitutional guarantee by appropriate legislation. That is the power which this bill now seeks to put in exercise. It proposes to enforce the constitutional guarantee against inequality and discrimination by appropriate legislation. It does not seek to confer new rights, nor to place rights conferred by State citizenship under the protection of the United States, but simply to prevent and forbid inequality and discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Never was there a bill more completely within the constitutional power of Congress. Never was there a bill which appealed for support more strongly to that sense of justice and fair-play which has been said, and in the main with justice, to be a characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. The Constitution warrants it; the Supreme Court sanctions it; justice demands it.

Sir, I have replied to the extent of my ability to the arguments which have been presented by the opponents of this measure. I have replied also to some of the legal propositions advanced by gentlemen on the other side; and now that I am about to conclude, I am deeply sensible of the imperfect manner in which I have performed the task. Technically, this bill is to decide upon the civil status of the colored American citizen; a point disputed at the very formation of our present Government, when by a short-sighted policy, a policy repugnant to true republican government, one negro counted as three-fifths of a man. The logical result of this mistake of the framers of the Constitution strengthened the cancer of slavery, which finally spread its poisonous tentacles over the southern portion of the body-politic. To arrest its growth and save the nation we have passed through the harrowing operation of intestine war, dreaded at all times, resorted to at the last extremity, like the surgeon's knife, but absolutely necessary to extirpate the disease which threatened with the life of the nation the overthrow of civil and political liberty on this continent. In that dire extremity the members of the race which I have the honor in part to represent—the race which pleads for justice at your hands to-day, forgetful of their inhuman and brutalizing servitude at the South, their degradation and ostracism at the North—flew willingly and gallantly to the support of the national Government. Their sufferings, assistance, privations, and trials in the swamps and in the rice-fields, their valor on the land and on the sea, is a part of the ever-glorious record which makes up the history of a nation preserved, and might, should I urge the claim, incline you to respect and guarantee their rights and privileges as citizens of our common Republic. But I remember that valor, devotion, and loyalty are not always rewarded according to their just deserts, and that after the battle some who have borne the brunt of the fray may, through neglect or contempt, be assigned to a subordinate place, while the enemies in war may be preferred to the sufferers.

The results of the war, as seen in reconstruction, have settled forever the political status of my race. The passage of this bill will determine the civil status, not only of the negro, but of any other class of citizens who may feel themselves discriminated against. It will form the cap-stone of that temple of liberty, begun on this continent under discouraging circumstances, carried on in spite of the sneers of monarchists and the cavils of pretended friends of freedom, until at last it stands in all its beautiful symmetry and proportions, a building the grandest which the world has ever seen, realizing the most sanguine expectations and the highest hopes of those who, in the name of equal, impartial, and universal liberty, laid the foundation stones.

The Holy Scriptures tell us of an humble hand-maiden who long, faithfully and patiently gleaned in the rich fields of her wealthy kinsman; and we are told further that at last, in spite of her humble antecedents, she found complete favor in his sight. For over two centuries our race has "reaped down your fields." The cries and woes which we have uttered have "entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth," and we are at last politically free. The last vestiture only is needed—civil rights. Having gained this, we may, with hearts overflowing with gratitude, and thankful that our prayer has been granted, repeat the prayer of Ruth: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me." [Great applause.]

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor and yielded to

Mr. BELL, who said: Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that from the number of gentlemen who desire to participate in this discussion I shall not have an opportunity to submit to the consideration of the House my views, and those of my constituents, upon this question. I therefore ask the consent of the House to the publication in the RECORD of some remarks I have prepared on this subject.

Mr. RAINEY. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances I would prefer not to thrust myself into discussions on this floor, but rather to listen and learn from others of larger experience than myself the true interests of the country in shaping its legislation. I fully realize the difficulty of fairly presenting, in the time allotted to me, the true character of this bill in any of its aspects.

I am further embarrassed by the conviction that the prejudices of the late civil war, though abating, standing between myself and a majority of this House, prevent the just force of fair argument; that the spirit of conciliation which actuated the States in the revolutionary struggle, and in framing the Federal Constitution, will not mark the result of our action on this bill.

Representing, however, that small section of the Union which is most affected by it, I am impelled by so keen a sense of its unconstitutionality, of its folly, of the absence of occasion for it, of the degradation and distress to the whites, and the injury to the people of both races, that I should feel that I had acted falsely to the trust confided to me were I from any motive to remain silent. I am aware, sir, that presenting a constitutional argument to a party which has claimed and exercised the right to deprive States of representation at pleasure, to tear down State governments and establish others in their stead, and to force them to ratify constitutional amendments by the power of the bayonet, and has thus created so many precedents in violation of the Constitution that the sanctity of its obligations is not heeded as hoped for by its framers, would seem to be a useless consumption of time. Being restricted to twenty minutes, I do not intend to review them, but merely to note them as usurpations of the legislative department of the Government. Mr. DAWES, in referring to a compilation of decisions in election cases made during and since the war by the Committee on Elections, of which I believe he was chairman, declared they did not deserve weight as precedents, because they were made amid the passions aroused by sectional strife, and were wanting in that calmness of consideration which was a condition-precedent to right judgment. May we not hope that after nearly a decade has separated us from the termination of the war the same candor can be invoked in the consideration of the present subject of discussion?

If so, then the dawn of a happier day—of peace, prosperity, and a genuine reunion—is surely breaking upon the American people.

The power to pass this law it is asserted is to be found in the first section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. That section declares:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Then follow the third, fourth, and last section, which provides Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article.

The rights sought to be secured by this bill have always hitherto been regarded as subject to State legislation. This section does not divest State authority, but fixes a qualification to the exercise thereof. The bill does not assume the States have violated that section or have failed to enforce its provisions; but proceeds directly to divest them of all power, and to prescribe penalties, and to confer exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal courts. We are told that, in some of the States, while the laws are ample the courts and juries are not disposed to execute them. It is not pretended that this is true in all the States, and yet all of them under this bill lose their power over the subject-matter.

Even downtrodden Louisiana, plundered and ruled by her former slaves, is told that this additional humiliation awaits her. The American Congress have by unconstitutional means forced a negro government upon them, and yet we are told with all its machinery in their hands the negroes cannot protect their own rights. The daring effrontery of this effort verifies the wisdom of the warning of Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson to the American people, to guard against the danger of usurpation in the legislative department of the Government, for there lay the greatest danger of tyranny.

I know it has been said that if the section referred to gave no power save that of a negative upon the acts of the States there could be no legislation.

The Constitution declares no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. This is an individual right placed under the protection of the General Government; and in order to secure it Congress have passed a law authorizing a writ of error to the Supreme Court wherever the right thus secured to the individual was drawn in question. And all State laws impairing the obligations of a contract were void, and yet no one has ever doubted the right of a State to pass laws to enforce rights. Believing that it will meet the full issue with the bill, I quote the following paragraph and the opinion of the Supreme Court thereon:

"Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

In the light of the history of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the State where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirement, then by the fifth section of the fourteenth article of amendment Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. In the early history of the formation of the Government its statesmen seem to have divided on the line which should separate the powers of the national Government from those of the State governments; and though this line has never been very well defined, in public opinion such a division has continued from that day to this.

When the civil war broke out, it was then discovered the true danger to the perpetuity of the Union was the capacity of the State organizations to combine and concentrate all the powers of the State, and of contiguous States, for a determined resistance to the General Government. Unquestionably this has given great force to the argument, and added largely to the number of those who believe in the necessity of a strong national Government.

But, however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States, with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and property—was essential to the working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States and to confer additional power on the nation.

The same reach of power here claimed can certainly grasp not only the control of State elections, but every other subject of State legislation. Beware lest unkindness to the South should prove the charming web in whose meshes our liberty shall perish. The national Legislature may yet prove the blind Samsonian strength which shal move the pillars of her temple from their place and destroy its votaries.

General BUTLER has said that in a foreign country we are bound to protect the rights of our citizens, and we must therefore have the right against the States. In the former case the States are prohibited by the Constitution from extending protection, this being entirely and necessarily delegated to the General Government, whereas they may and ought to do so as between their own citizens. Again, he says he wants this law to prohibit a negro from being pitched out of a car in cases where it is difficult to tell in what State the wrong was perpetrated. If he is serious in this, I imagine that when thrown off the negro could as easily ascertain his whereabouts as he could find a Federal court. As to any difficulty from one State having no law, and another having it, to protect their rights, I assert that in all of them they have the same law as the whites. Again, sir, how is it to be expected that if juries will not convict in State courts, they will be more virtuous in Federal courts? Is the manner of selecting jurors to be so devised as to secure men in sympathy with these prosecutions?

In my own State the jurors in the Federal court are selected so that they are comprised of persons pre-eminently ignorant and prejudiced against the white people thereof. A fair trial is despaired of by a white man if his controversy is with a negro. In the name of Christianity, of civilization, of liberty, and law; by the memories of the struggle of 1776, and the better days of the Republic; by the consciousness that a common destiny awaits us all, I urge you not to permit sectional feeling to prompt so great a crime.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I invite attention to the situation in my own city of the two races, in connection with the subjects of present legislation, which fairly illustrates my State.

The negroes have their own inns, and neither seek nor desire entertainment at those resorted to by the whites. They have the same cemetery with the whites, divided between the races, and each portion cared for alike. They have railroad facilities, comfortable and satisfactory. They have tasteful and substantial churches, erected largely by the contributions of generous white men, and which are to them a source of pride. They resort freely to places of public amusement, and have assigned them comfortable seats. They have equal educational facilities, both as to school-houses and teachers, with the whites; and could this House know how fully they are provided for in this respect it would compel their warmest commendation.

Often times they outnumber the whites in the jury-box. I do not mean to say they are in the jury-box in all counties, but do say that in many counties not one-fourth of the white voters have their names placed in it. A kindly feeling exists between the races. Labor, which had been demoralized by political excitement, is becoming profitable to laborer and employer, and mutual confidence and good-will is in process of perfect restoration. Let our people alone, and liberty, wealth, and harmony will spring forth in young and vigorous life, and commend the wisdom of your conduct.

But, sir, we are told the Government owes it to the colored people that this bill shall pass. There are in the Southern States two races, as distinct in their social feelings and prejudices as in color. These have a natural force beyond the control of human law. The sooner they are recognized by our rulers the better for both races and the country. Force the negro into the common schools where the white children go, and the whites will withdraw. The common schools will be abandoned, and the only hope for the moral and intellectual elevation of the negro will sink below the horizon forever. Force them into public inns, and the proprietor must submit to your prosecutions or abandon his calling, for the whites will not remain in such association. Public inconvenience follows, but nothing for the public good. Common carriers will be more or less affected by it.

What will be the result as to churches, cemeteries, and public amusements, I cannot exactly delineate. An unkind and ungenerous feeling will permeate all intercourse between the two races. The deplorable consequences, socially, politically, materially, cannot be overstated.

This Government cannot lay well these foundations for social equality. Mr. Speaker, the sovereignty of the States may be overthrown, the pride of the people may be mocked, their property may be swept away, cruel imprisonment may afflict them, the power of the Government may be turned in fearful vengeance upon them; but there is a law of the Creator that for a time may cease to operate, but can never become obsolete, that governs this question.

I assert, sir, that there is a disposition on the part of the whites to give the negro equal rights. Whatever inequality of public accommodations there may be is simply the result of an indisposition to social intercourse. But this even is not to be found in their laws or their courts.

Sir, the whites naturally view this as an attempt at ultimate amalgamation. This necessarily involves their degradation. A mean alliance always begets a progeny below the level of the better parent. If this is not true, why, when equal facilities for mental improvement are accorded to each race, demand they shall be placed side by side in the same school-room? The pride of the southern whites deserves admiration rather than execration.

Were the people not to be affected by this legislation seriously in the same situation with us, I know full well this bill would not pass. Surely they are led by abstractions rather than a practical comprehension of the real wants of the South. In the name of the Constitution of our common country; in behalf of the time-honored power of the States to regulate the civil rights of its citizens; from an earnest desire to preserve the present good-feeling between the two races, and to avoid the antagonism and industrial detriment that is about to be called into life, I earnestly urge this House not to pass this measure. It contains evil, and evil only. It tells the white people of the South the war shall last forever. "While you have given to the Government great men and means whereby our liberties were established, you, their descendants, shall drink the dregs of humiliation forever!" Our people know this Government is to be theirs, and offer true allegiance to it. Only a few days ago a distinguished leader of the dominant party in this House, in discussing the bill making additional appropriations for the Navy, said he was confident there was not a man on this floor who was not prepared to vote every dollar necessary to the vindication of the national honor. It was true not only of this House, but of all sections of this country. Why stifle the feeling? Why wound the pride of such people? The strength of a nation must rest upon the affections of its subjects. Why, then, should they not be cherished?

Mr. Speaker, I represent an intelligent, brave, and generous people, and for them I have sought the attention of this House. For them I enter solemn protest against the passage of this bill, and invoke that justice which future times will award them.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the civil-rights bill.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor, and said: Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion several times to express my general views in relation to the questions involved in this bill, and therefore do not feel at liberty to occupy time now myself. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, after the magnificent and unanswerable speech of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] I feel reluctant to trespass on the patience of the House. I would not do so, but it seems to me there are some considerations in favor of the constitutional power and duty of Congress to pass this bill which possibly have not been fully presented.

To determine the question whether this bill should pass, we may properly inquire what it is or is not; whether it is within the constitutional power of Congress to make it a law, and if we have a discretion in the matter, the expediency of its provisions or objects.

It proposes to make it a penal offense for any corporation or person to make any distinction because of race or color in affording to any citizen of the United States the privilege of admission to or accommodation in several enumerated classes of public institutions created and protected for public purposes by authority of either common or statutory law, or both. It proposes to secure equal privileges, regardless of race or color, in public inns, licensed places of public amusement, in the means of public carriage of passengers and freight, in cemeteries, and benevolent institutions; and an equal opportunity for instruction in schools supported in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use.

All these are created or recognized and protected by public law, and the bill proposes to declare that their benefits, like the dews of heaven, shall descend alike upon all citizens, whether an American, or Irish, or German, or African sun may have burned upon them.

It should be observed that the bill does not give or propose to give or create any right where none existed before; but it simply declares that wherever public rights already exist by law in favor of citizens generally, none shall be excluded merely on account of race or color. This is the rule of justice and the only rule of safety.

This bill is supplemental to the civil-rights act of April 9, 1866.

Congress has the constitutional power to pass this bill. The protection of the rights of citizens enumerated in the bill is not left exclusively to the care of the States. This may be proved by the language of the Constitution, by the history of some of its provisions, and by the determination of the courts.

The fourteenth article of amendments declares that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens * * *; nor shall any State * * * deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

And—

Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

If a doubt could arise as to how these words are to be interpreted, if any question could exist as to their construction, let it be remembered they are provisions in favor of human rights, and all such are to be liberally construed to effectuate their object.

The object of this provision is to make all men equal before the law. If a State permits inequality in rights to be created or meted out by citizens or corporations enjoying its protection it denies the equal protection of the laws. What the State permits by its sanction, having the power to prohibit, it does in effect itself.

A remedial power in the Constitution is to be construed liberally. (Chisholm vs. Georgia, 2 Dallas, 476.)

Where a power is remedial in its nature there is much reason to contend that it ought to be construed liberally. (1 Story, Const., §429.)

The rule of the liberal construction of the power to make laws necessary and proper to carry into effect all the provisions of the Constitution was adopted in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat.

Adopting this rule, then, the word "laws" must include all laws which prevail in a State—constitutions, treaties, statutes, common law, international law—in brief, all laws.

When it is said "no State shall deny to any person the equal protection" of these laws, the word "protection" must not be understood in any restricted sense, but must include every benefit to be derived from laws. The word "deny" must include an omission by any State to enforce or secure the equal rights designed to be protected. There are sins of omission as well as commission. A State which omits to secure rights denies them. This section deals with "the privileges" and the "immunities of citizens"—not some privileges, but "the privileges"—all privileges, and for all these the "equal protection," the equal benefit, of all laws is to be extended to all citizens.

By the common law it is the duty of common carriers of passengers and freight to carry all orderly and well-conditioned persons.

Story, in his work on bailments, says:

One of the duties of a common carrier is, to receive and carry all goods offered for transportion by any persons whatsover, upon receiving a suitable hire * * * if he will not * * * he will be liable to an action unless there is a reasonable ground for the refusal. (Section 508.)

And no law-book has ventured to say the color of the person offering goods is any ground for refusal.

He says of common carriers of passengers:

The first and most general obligation on their part is, to carry passengers whenever they offer themselves and are ready to pay for their transportation * * * they are no more at liberty to refuse a passenger, if they have sufficient room and accommodation, than an inn-keeper is to refuse suitable room and accommodations to a guest. (Section 591.)

The fourteenth amendment declares, in effect, that no State "shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws;" that is, the equal benefit of these principles of common law shared by and existing for the protection of citizens generally. Still more, it declares that Congress shall enforce this equality of privileges

When the States by law create and protect, and by taxation on the property of all support, benevolent institutions designed to care for those who need their benefits, the dictates of humanity require that equal provision should be made for all. Those who share these benefits enjoy in them and by them "the protection of the laws," the benefit of all that results from the laws which create, protect, and support them. And by the fourteenth amendment, no State shall deny to any the equal benefit of these laws, and Congress is charged with the duty of enforcing this equality of benefits or protection; and to make this effectual it is declared that "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation" this right to an equal participation in the benefit to result from the law regulating common carriers. And this principle applies to every public benefit enjoyed by citizens generally under or by reason of public law.

If Congress does not have the power to legislate to secure the right to enjoy these equal benefits then what is it that "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation?"

It is a rule of interpretation that words are to be construed so that they may have some effect—verba ita sunt intelligenda ut res magis valeat quam pereat.

The history of the amendments to the Constitution proves that the design of the fourteenth amendment was to confer upon Congress the power to enforce civil rights.

The first act of Congress known as the civil-rights law, is dated April 9, 1866.

The necessity for this was abundantly shown in the debates of Congress. (Globe, 1st session Thirty-ninth Congress, 1160–1833.)

This law was designed to secure equality for all citizens in the civil rights enumerated in it.

But it encountered opposition in Congress, not merely from democrats, but from republicans, on the ground that the Constitution did not authorize it. (Volume 70, Globe, 1st session Thirty-ninth Congress, 1266–1291. Appendix, 156.)

In the debate March 9, 1866, Mr. Bingham said:

The enforcement of the bill of rights, touching the life, liberty, and property of every citizen of the republic, within every organized State of the Union, is of the reserved powers of the States, to be enforced by State tribunals and by State officials. (Page 1291.)

He proceeds to say that the civil-rights bill—

Should be the law of every State, by the voluntary act of every State. The law in every State should be just. It should be no respecter of persons. It is otherwise now.

He then proceeds to say:

I should remedy that, not by an arbitrary assumption of power, but by amending the Constitution of the United States, expressly prohibiting the States from any such abuse of power in the future.

On the 28th of February, 1866, in discussing one of the many propositions to amend the Constitution, all having substantially the same object, he said:

The proposition * * * is simply a proposition to arm the Congress of the United States with the power to enforce the bill of rights as it stands in the Constitution.

One day less than two months after the civil-rights bill had been opposed in Congress as unconstitutional the provisions of the fourteenth amendment were first discussed in this House, on the 8th of May, 1866.

The "great commoner"—Thaddeus Stevens—in opening the debate, after stating the provisions of the first section, said:

I can hardly believe that any person can be found who will not admit that every one of these provisions is just. They are all asserted in some form or other in our declaration or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States so far, that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. (Globe, vol. 71, p. 2459.)

And he proceeded to show that this would not leave the civil-rights law subject to repeal, but ingraft it on the Constitution in principle and effect.

Mr. Finck said of the first section:

If it is necessary to adopt it in order to confer upon Congress power over the matters contained in it, then the civil-rights bill is clearly unconstitutional. (Page 2461.)

Mr. Boyer said:

The first section embodies the principles of the civil-rights bill. * * * The fifth and last section of the amendment empowers Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article. (Page 2467.)

On the 9th of May, 1866, Mr. Broomall said:

It may be asked why should we put a provision in the Constitution which is already contained in an act of Congress? [Civil-rights law.] The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Bingam, may answer this question. He says the act is unconstitutional. * * * While I differ from him upon the law, yet it is not with that certainty of being right that would justify me in refusing to place the power to enact the law unmistakably in the Constitution. (Page 2498.)

Mr. Shanklin said of the amendment:

There are two prominent and distinct ideas contained in this proposition. The first idea is to strike down the reserved rights of the States, those rights which were declared by the framers of the Constitution to belong to the States exclusively. * * The first section * * is to strike down those State rights and invest all power in the General Government. (Page 2500.)

Mr. Raymond said of the first or civil-rights section:

It was first embodied in a proposition introduced by Mr. Bingham in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, giving to Congress power to secure an absolute equality of civil rights, and is still pending. Next it came before us in the form of a bill, (the civil-rights bill,) by which Congress proposed to exercise precisely the powers which that amendment was intended to confer, and to provide for enforcing against State tribunals the prohibitions against unequal legislation. I regarded it as very doubtful whether Congress, under the existing Constitution, had any power to enact such a law. And now, although that bill became a law, it is again proposed to so amend the Constitution as to confer upon Congress the power to pass it. I was in favor of securing an equality of rights to all citizens; all I asked was that it should be done by the exercise of powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. And so believing, I shall vote for this proposed amendment to the Constitution. (Page 2502.)

The debate in the Senate is equally explicit. On the 30th of May, 1866, Mr. Doolittle said:

The celebrated civil-rights bill, which was the forerunner of this constitutional amendment, and to give validity to which this constitutional amendment is brought forward, and which, without this constitutional amendment to enforce it, has no validity, &c. (Page 2896.)

Mr. Hendricks, on the 4th of June, said:

The sixth and last section provides that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article. When these words were used in the amendment abolishing slavery they were thought to be harmless, but during this session there has been claimed for them such force and scope of meaning as that Congress might invade the jurisdiction of the States, rob them of their reserved rights, and crown the Federal Government with absolute and despotic power. As construed, this provision is most dangerous. (Page 2940.)

It had been claimed by Mr. Yates that by virtue of the thirteenth amendment "every man in the United States, without regard to color, * * was a citizen," clothed with "the muniments of freedom, the rights, franchises, privileges that appertain to an American citizen," and that Congress had power by "appropriate legislation" under the provisions of the thirteenth amendment "to enforce" that, as well as secure equal rights, civil, as well as political. (Pages 1255, 3037.) And this has been so held as to civil rights by Justice Swayne in the case of the United States vs. Rhodes.

In the same debate, my distinguished friend the able gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] then in the Senate, said of the fourteenth amendment:

The great social and political change in the Southern States wrought by the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery and by the overthrow of the late rebellion renders it eminently proper and necessary that Congress should be invested with the power to enforce this provision throughout the country, and compel its observance. * * State laws exist * * in direct violation of these principles. Congress has already shown its desire and intention to uproot and destroy all such partial State legislation in the passage of what is called the civil-rights bill. The power to do this has been doubted. * * No doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican government. (Page 2961.)

The debates show that these distinct assertions of the powers to be conferred on Congress by the fourteenth amendment were not controverted. No one ventured to deny them.

The debates on the thirteenth and fifteenth amendments are explicit in corroborating this purpose.

The fifteenth amendment, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] says, does not "bestow or even declare any rights;" but it does prohibit States from denying the equal right of suffrage. Congress has power to enforce the prohibition by "appropriate legislation." Here is the power to enforce a prohibition.

A similar power is given in the same words in the fourteenth amendment.

The power of Congress to enact the civil-rights bill and to pass this is settled by the reasoning and authority of adjudicated cases and elementary writers. Among these I will cite Smith vs. Moody, 26 Indiana, 307; in re A. H. Somers, by the chief justice of the court of appeals of Maryland; United States vs. Rhodes, decided in 1867 in the United States circuit court Kentucky, 7 American Law Register, N. S., 233; in re Turner, by Chase, C. J., habeas corpus, Maryland, 1867; ex parte Griffin, by Chase, C. J., circuit court Virginia, 1869, 8 American Law Register, N. S., 365; Farrar's Manual Constitution, 448; Paschal's Annotated Constitution, 273, 290.

In the case of the United States vs. Rhodes, decided by Mr. Justice Swayne, there was an indictment under the civil-rights act of April 6, 1866, for burglary, in Kentucky, and the court took jurisdiction on the ground that the statute of Kentucky discriminated against colored citizens in the law of evidence. The court held that the civil-rights act was authorized, and gave the jurisdiction by virtue of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, and that Under this act all persons stand upon a plane of equality before the law as respects the civil rights therein mentioned and intended to be protected, without distinction as to race or color or any previous condition of slavery." (7 American Law Register, N. S., 233.)

In ex parte Griffin, decided by Chief Justice Chase in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Virginia, in 1869, the question arose whether the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution did ex proprio vigore remove from office persons lawfully appointed before its adoption though they may have been ineligible to hold such office under the prohibition it contains.

The Chief Justice, in holding the negative, said:

The object of the amendment is to exclude from certain offices a certain class of persons. Now it is obviously impossible to do this by a simple declaration, whether in the Constitution or in an act of Congress. * * For in the very nature of things it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition before any sentence of exclusion can be made to operate. To accomplish this ascertainment, and insure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcement of decisions more or less formal are indispensable; and these can only be provided by Congress.

Now the necessity of this is recognized by the amendment itself in its fifth and final section, which declares that "Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article."

There are, indeed, other sections than the third to the enforcement of which legislation is necessary; but there is no one which more clearly requires legislation in order to give effect to it. The fifth section qualifies the third to the same extent as it would if the whole amendment consisted of these two sections. (8 American Law Register, N. S., 365.)

In construing the fourteenth amendment we may properly, as Blackstone says, consider "the old law, the mischief, and the remedy."

That is, to ascertain the "remedy intended to be provided" by this amendment it is proper to know the "mischiefs complained of or apprehended," the "existing or anticipated evils." (United States vs. Rhodes, 7 Am. Law Reg., 247.)

These evils have been stated by Kent; by Justice Swayne; they were pointed out in the debates in Congress on the civil-rights bill and on the fourteenth amendment. (2 Kent Com., 281–282, note; United States vs. Rhodes, 7 Am. Law Reg., 247; Globe, vol. 70, 1st sess. 39th Cong., pp. 1160–1833.)

Mr. Justice Swayne, referring to the era of slavery up to the time of emancipation, says:

Slaves were imperfectly, if at all, protected from the grossest outrages by the whites. Justice was not for them. The charities and rights of the domestic relations had no legal existence among them.

In a note to Kent it is said the law in Louisiana—

Not only forbids any person teaching slaves to read or write, but it declares that any person using language * * * or making use of any sign or actions having a tendency to produce discontent among the free colored population, * * * or who shall be knowingly instrumental in bringing into the State any paper, book, or pamphlet having a like tendency, shall on conviction be punishable with imprisonment or death, at the discretion of the court.

And Justice Swayne said of the period after emancipation:

The shadow of the evil fell upon the free blacks. They had but few civil and no political rights in the slave States. Many of the badges of the bondman's degradation were fastened upon them. * * * The States had always claimed and exercised the exclusive right to fix the status of all persons living within their jurisdiction.

The evil then was that civil rights were unsafe when left to the States where the spirit of slavery still lived.

This evil Congress attempted to remedy in part by the civil-rights law of April 9, 1866. But, as the constitutionality of this had been called in question, Congress designed to remove all doubt, and to give Congress power to secure equal civil rights to all.

This purpose was incorporated in the fourteenth amendment, concluding with the unmistakable words: "Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

It is incredible that Congress in submitting the fourteenth amendment, or the people in adopting it, did not clearly intend to give to Congress the power claimed; did not intend to provide an effectual remedy for the evils which had been so fully and frequently denounced. The civil-rights act is dated April 9, 1866.

The final action of Congress in proposing to the people the fourteenth amendment was June 13, 1866. It was adopted by the people through the State Legislatures.

And then the civil-rights law was re-enacted April 20, 1871, by many of the members of Congress who had voted to submit the amendment. This contemporaneous construction of the amendment carries more than persuasive force as to its true meaning. (Paschal's Annotated Constitution 277, note 274; McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 401; United States vs. Rhodes, 7 American Law Register, 233.)

But Congress has repeatedly added to the persuasive force of this construction—by the "enforcement" act of May 31, 1870, February 28, 1871; and, finally, the Ku-Klux act of April 20, 1871. (Appendix Congressional Globe, March, 1871, p. 70.)

All these acts proceed upon the idea that if a State omits or neglects to secure the enforcement of equal rights, that it "denies" the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment.

The Slaughter-house cases (16 Wallace, 81) concede the power to pass this bill.

The means provided in this bill of enforcing the Constitution are fully authorized.

The power to secure equal civil rights by "appropriate legislation" is an express power; and Congress, therefore, is the exclusive judge of the proper means to employ. This has been settled in McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 420; Priggs vs. Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 539; Ex parte Coupland, 26 Texas, 387; 1 Story Const., 432; Moore vs. Illinois, 14 Howard, 20.

These cases show, too, that Congress may enforce generally the provisions of the Constitution.

I will not now discuss the expediency of this measure. It is always expedient to do right. Equality of civil and political rights, of all rights which exist under law, is simple justice.

The fourteenth amendment was designed to secure this equality of rights; and we have no discretion to say that we will not enforce its provisions. There is no question of discretion involved except as to the means we may employ. The real question is, whether, knowing our duty, we will perform it. The colored man is a citizen of the republic, and his rights, equally with all others, this Congress must respect if the Constitution is to be obeyed.

Mr. POLAND. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I will not attempt to discuss any of the legal or other of the graver questions which have been under discussion by much abler men than myself. I leave these to gentlemen who are better qualified to enlighten the House in regard to them. But I desire to say a word upon a single point; a point which, although very familiar, is nevertheless very suggestive and full of instruction when followed to its logical consequence in connection with a subject like this.

Now, sir, if any member of this House were asked to-day what is the greatest single element of national strength, of national prosperity, of national permanence and power, I believe he would unhesitatingly answer that the greatest element of strength to every nation is the universal good-will and confidence of all classes of its citizens. This is fundamental; the granite rock upon which all real national greatness must rest. Every nation that would be strong, every nation that would be permanent, must have the universal good-will and confidence of all classes, from the highest to the lowest, from the strongest to the weakest. That kind of confidence the Government must possess in the heart of the citizen which grows out of the knowledge on his part that there is both the disposition and the ability on the part of the Government to protect him; to protect him in his person, to protect him in his home, to protect him in his family, and in every natural and legal right which he may possess.

And, sir, it is necessary for the Government to pursue such a course as shall give assurance to every human being in the land—to the very humblest, to the poorest, to the most friendless citizen—that it will protect him; that it will search him out in his obscurity, in his poverty, and in his friendlessness, and will hold out over him the broad shield of the Constitution and the laws. It is necessary, it is indispensable to national greatness and power, that this impression should be made upon the heart of every citizen, so that every citizen may have confidence that the Government under which he lives will accomplish this result. It is indispensable to national permanence and national existence.

How can any country prosper without patriotism, and how can patriotism exist unless this confidence in the Government be found in the heart of the citizen? I know, sir, that poets describe patriotism as a glorious Ariel-like creature which floats in the clouds; but you and I, Mr. Speaker, know, and this House knows, that the real patriotism of this world, the patriotism that will wear, the patriotism that is good for anything for national defense, the patriotism which can give and take battle and risk life in defense of country, is not the patriotism which lives in the clouds, but the patriotism which stands upon solid ground, dusty though it be. Patriotism, to be worth anything, must have its foundation in equal protection under the law. It must spring out of hearts that cherish confidence in the Government, which cherish affection for the Government, that feel the interests of the citizen is the same as the interests of the Government; that its prosperity is their prosperity; its danger is their danger; that anything which threatens its glory and power also threatens them, however humble they may be. When the citizen feels this, then if the country which cherishes and protects him happens to be exposed to dangers from abroad or dangers from home the very blood in his heart runs lightning at the thought of peril to the Constitution and laws which afford him refuge.

Why, sir, there is no example in history of any nation sinking into decay which still possessed the confidence and affection of its citizens. And there is no example of continued prosperity on the part of any government which lost this confidence.

We are coming back again, sir, to the very fundamental principles of government. This is the very starting-point of national prosperity. If we fail to secure equal protection under the laws, we fail wholly; and it is the duty of Congress, whatever else it may or may not do, whatever else it may pass or fail to pass, that it shall leave no doubt in the mind of any human being in the land as to the question whether equal protection of the laws shall be extended to all classes of citizens.

I know, sir, that our friends on the other side of the House have spoken of this case as if it were an exceptional one. They tell us that the class of persons that this bill is designed to protect is a peculiar class, and it is not quite so easy to apply constitutional protection to them. They are a different people; they are a different race; a strong prejudice exists against them; they have lately been in a condition of servitude which subjected them to degradation and contempt, and there are peculiar difficulties in the way of carrying out constitutional protection in a right line for the benefit of this class of people. Well, sir, what does all this amount to, except that this class of people are peculiarly exposed to hazard; that their rights are in special danger?

The very fact that there are peculiar difficulties in the case shows that it is one which demands peculiar attention. The very fact of these difficulties, of these prejudices, of this contempt, shows that this is a class of our citizens which specially demands the protection of the law. And surely gentlemen do not mean to tell us or to argue that the fact that this class is in peculiar danger, and is peculiarly exposed, is a reason why the protection of the law should not be extended to them.

We must remember that no chain is stronger than its weakest link. And it is just here—in the case of a despised class, in the case of a class that is exposed to so many dangers—it is just here that the justice and the power and the disposition of the Government to protect are tested. It is only in cases of this kind that it can be tested. Why, sir, the rich, the strong, the powerful can get along well enough under almost any kind of government. The worst governments have made such men comfortable, but it is only a good and strong government that can protect those classes which specially need protection; those classes that are poor, that are friendless, that have been in servitude and lately emerged from it. It is just here that the character of the Government, its disposition, its power to do right, is fully tested. And if we fail here, if we cannot protect this class, then it may be concluded that we cannot protect anybody. This is the point to which some of our friends appear not to do justice. I say if we fail to protect the colored race upon this continent we thereby do actually fail to protect anybody. For it is a matter of principle; it is not a question as to who the individual is that is to be protected or is to fail of it. If we fail to protect the poorest, the humblest, the most despised, the blackest man, we fail totally. If we sin in one point, we are guilty of all. The principle falls to the ground, and we know not whose the loss may be; although it may be the question to-day whether the colored man's rights shall be protected, to-morrow the question may be different. And if we establish the miserable precedent that we must withdraw the ægis of protection from over the head of the poorest and blackest man, which of us shall be sure of continuing to enjoy the benefit of that protecting ægis over his own home? None of us. If we once put into our history this wretched precedent of leaving the heads of the poor to be pelted by the pitiless storms of persecution and obloquy, we leave our own homes and our own families exposed to the next attack.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak to the reason, not to the prejudice of this body. I propose candidly to offer some reasons why I cannot vote for this bill.

Without further preliminaries, I will state that I believe it is unconstitutional, impolitic, and unnecessary; fraught only with mischief to the parties whose interests it is intended to subserve. If the fact be, Mr. Speaker, that the bill is unconstitutional, and if that fact can be demonstrated here, that ought to be the end of the question. And I presume Representatives upon both sides of the House, concurring in the conviction or opinion that it is unconstitutional, will concede that this bill ought not to pass. They will, I have no doubt, manifest a patriotism that will show that they love the Constitution and their country more than they do any color, race, or previous condition of servitude. Permit me, then, Mr. Speaker, to invite the attention of this honorable body to a few candid remarks which I propose to submit to their consideration.

The friends of the bill base their argument for its support upon the fourteenth amendment, and upon the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States. The fourteenth amendment in its first paragraph declares a dual citizenship of the people of the United States: first, a citizenship of the United States; second by a citizenship of the States. In the subsequent paragraph it provides certain prohibitions on the States; and I desire gentlemen to permit me to give emphasis to the language of the Constitution itself—prohibitions upon the States, not upon the individuals composing the States. These prohibitions are intended to protect the citizens of the United States against oppressive legislation on the part of the States. The plain import of the words can convey no other meaning. The language forbids the idea that it was intended to confer on Congress a grand police power over the social and domestic relations of the people of the States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first proposition to which I invite the attention of the House, and I hope that the distinguished chairman of the committee who has charge of the bill will feel himself called upon to answer the argument, is this: that the fourteenth amendment confers no new grant of power upon the Congress of the United States. I say, sir, that that question has been settled both by legislative and judicial precedents. I invite the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee to this argument, and I wish no evasion of it. In the first place we have the legislative action of this body. Mrs. Woodhull as a memorialist asked of this honorable body that it would grant the right of suffrage to her sex. That memorial was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which the distinguished Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was a member at the time. That committee reported this as the construction they placed upon the amendment:

The clause of the fourteenth amendment, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," does not, in the opinion of the committee, refer to privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States other than those privileges and immunities embraced in the original text of the Constitution, article two section four. The fourteenth amendment, it is believed, did not add to the privileges or immunities before mentioned, but was deemed necessary for their enforcement as an express limitation upon the powers of the States. It had been judicially determined that the first eight articles of amendment of the Constitution were not limitations on the power of the States, and it was apprehended that the same might be held of the provision of the second section, fourth article.

Further on they say:

The words "citizens of the United States," and "citizens of the States," as employed in the fourteenth amendment, did not change or modify the relations of citizens of the State and nation as they existed under the original Constitution.

What was the legislative action of gentlemen upon the other side of the House on that subject? They voted for the reception of that report of the committee and against the report of the minority, headed, as I believe it was, by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I made a minority report.

Mr. BRIGHT. I know you did; I have it before me. A similar memorial was presented to the Senate by Miss Susan B. Anthony, and was referred to the Judiciary Committee of that body. That committee reported unanimously in favor of adopting the same opinion as that of the majority of the House committee, and they followed the same line of argument.

In the Slaughter-house cases the Supreme Court of the United States says this:

In the case of Paul vs. Virginia the court, in expounding this clause of the Constitution, says that "the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each State in the several States by the provision in question are those privileges and immunities which are common to the citizens in the latter States under their constitution and laws by virtue of their being citizens.

The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the State in which they were claimed or exercised, nor did it profess to control the power of the State governments over the rights of its own citizens.

Its sole purpose was to declare to the several States that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

But they say further, and to this I ask especial attention:

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are we will presently consider, but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

Is that satisfactory? Is that the law of the land? Is that the proper construction to place upon the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States? If so, the question is settled, and this body cannot override that decision without overriding the Constitution of the United States. I ask some gentleman on the other side to meet this question fairly, and say whether it was intended by that amendment to confer any new powers upon the Congress of the United States. The Supreme Court has settled that question; and if you were here, gentlemen, empanneled as a jury, you would be compelled by your oaths to decide that it conferred no new powers upon Congress.

But I add another authority. The Supreme Court, in the case of Bradwell vs. The State of Illinois, following up the decision in the Slaughter-house cases, made this decision:

The protection designed by that clause, (fourteenth amendment,) as has been repeatedly held, has no application to a citizen of the State whose laws are complained of. If the plaintiff was a citizen of the State of Illinois, that provision of the Constitution gave her no protection against its courts or its legislation.

Thus, after deliberation and review, the Supreme Court adhere to the construction given in the Slaughter-house cases.

I contend then, Mr. Speaker, that that is an end to the matter. If the passage of this bill would be unconstitutional, then where is the man who is bold enough to strike down the Constitution for the gratification of any prejudice or of any sympathy? If this bill is really an assumption of new powers by Congress, then its advocates are driven from the fourteenth amendment. Where, then, will they make their stand? It must be in article 4, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

I will endeavor to show that that will not avail them. Justice Story (2 Const., sec. 1806,) in commenting on that subject, said that clause was only intended to confer on the citizens of each State general citizenship; that it confers no privileges or immunities above or beyond the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the citizens of the State which they make the home of their adoption. In short, the adopted citizen was to be made equal to the home-born citizen. It neither created nor defined the privileges and immunities of the citizens, but left them to look to their respective State governments as the sources from which they flow. If this be so, and I maintain that it is, it effectually excludes the legislative jurisdiction of Congress over the subject.

The authorities upon the subject can be piled mountain-high, and I will here call attention to some of them. In the first place to the opinion of Attorney-General Bates; second, to Webster's opinion in the case of Bank vs. Primrose; third, Corner vs. Elliott, 18 Howard; fourth, Canfield vs. Coryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, 380; fifth, the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives January 30, 1871; sixth, report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate January 25, 1872; seventh, the Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace; eighth, Bradley vs. Illinois, reaffirming the opinion in the Slaughter-house cases; ninth, the people who have everywhere exercised the power in all the States in the adoption of their constitutions; tenth, the legislatures have exercised these powers, granting charters to counties, towns, schools, railroads, and denying the right to vote to women, minors, ministers, felons, non-residents, and exercising power over the life, liberty, and property of their citizens. The States were governments in fact, so recognized by the Constitution of the United States, the true guardians of the immunities and privileges of their own citizens.

This great truth runs back of the Constitution of the United States and is the tap-root of American liberty, striking deep into the heart of our State and municipal governments, which lie nearest to the people, and which can best understand and provide for their wants When this body assumes a protectorate over them, it assumes a power and prerogative which never can administer equal justice.

Not only the Southern, but the Northern States exercised the right of making descriminations amongst their own citizens, on the grounds of public policy.

Massachusetts prohibited intermarriage between the races. Maine prohibited in the same way intermarriage. Connecticut denied the elective franchise to men of the colored race, as did Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and also the right to testify in cases where a white man was a party. New York had a property qualification against colored men. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, denied the ballot and intermarriage between the races and the right of colored men to give testimony against whites. The Southern States did the same. All the authorities, State and Federal, legislative and judicial, rise before the nation and interpose a bulwark against the passage of this act.

The only limitation upon this ancient right of the States to regulate their own domestic affairs is the fifteenth amendment, which prohibits the States from denying the right of suffrage to any citizen on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Again, if there is no authority under the fourteenth amendment, nor in the second clause of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, where does it get the authority? Has it a common-law authority? Sir, that never was incorporated as a part of the law of the United States. It never has been pretended to be exercised as a part of the law of the United States.

I have said that it was impolitic to pass this bill. The colored man has everything to lose by it, and nothing to gain. There is no coercive power on the part of Congress toward the State to compel it to levy a tax for educational purposes. The laws of some of the States are now giving the colored people the benefit of education, pouring its beams of enlightenment upon the African race, by dividing the school funds in proportion to the scholastic population of the two races, although they are separated into different schools. Should Congress attempt to drive the Southern States, having separate common schools, to the wall, and attempt to force their tastes, and, if you please, their natural and conventional repugnance to color and race, into social contact, they will refuse to tax themselves for the support of such an educational system. This the whites can do in Tennessee, for they can vote three to one over the colored people.

But I have no time to dwell upon that part of the subject. I have said that this bill was unnecessary. What rights are now denied to the colored race? They have the freedom of the press, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the ballot, the freedom of office, the freedom of the courts, and the rights of property. All the avenues of power and office of this Government have been thrown wide open to them.

The constitutions of the State governments have opened the avenues to them and let them in. The Constitution of the United States has opened to let them in. All the gates are wide open to them. Even the White House is now set as a prize before the eye of the African. Sir, they have all the rights of the boasted Roman citizen, the right of holding slaves excepted. Still they clamor here.

Why, Mr. Speaker, and Representatives upon the other side of the House, their civil and political elevation is unparalleled in the history of nations. No nation of their race before has emerged from the broken chains and yoke of slavery, been habilitated, and raised to the grandeur of American citizens, in the same length of time. France and England emancipated their slaves, but the emancipated never dreamed that they should have letters of nobility, or should be elevated to the woolsack; never, never.

Allow me two minutes more. I desire to refer to the real wants of the negro. Sir, he can stand a little tobacco-smoke in a railroad car better than he can the tobacco tax. Let him strive to get that off, and then to get back the seventy millions of cotton tax which the Government has taken unconstitutionally from him and us. Not only that, but cut down your tariff, lay your pruning-knife to it, and cut off the redundant excrescences. Reform your currency, which by its fluctuations has recently destroyed one-third of the value of the cotton crop, the result in a large part of the bone and the muscle, the sweat and the toil of the colored man. The wail of starving women and children comes up from the South this day on the authority of Bishop Wilmer, those of their own race, in consequence of their destitution. Let them aid to roll off the incubus from the breasts of their people, and then they will have done a service to themselves and their race, instead of contending for first places in cars and places of amusement. The vast majority of their race are laborers in the rural districts. Not one in ten thousand, perhaps, wants to travel on a car. They had better keep away from saloons and theaters. They are too poor to pay for accommodations in first-class hotels, which receive their patronage mainly from the rich and the fashionable. Only a few exceptional cases of their color can bear the expense of luxurious indulgences, and they are generally to be found about cities, and would have us turn the Government upside down for their accommodation. As a race they have their own churches, school-houses, eating-houses, boarding-houses, and as they advance in wealth they may have their own theaters. Let them look at the real matters of grievance by the Government, and not be deceived by this civil-rights bill, so called.

Mr. TREMAIN. As a member of the Committee of the Judiciary, which reported this bill, I have taken some notes of the arguments made here, with a view, if time and opportunity were allowed, to answer those that have been presented by some of the opponents of this bill, and also to present some reasons in favor of its passage. The time, however, allowed by the special order for its discussion is drawing to a close. I am admonished by the able arguments we have heard upon this floor from the representatives of the African race, who are more immediately interested in the passage of this bill, that the vindication of the newly-created rights of citizenship conferred by the amendments of the Constitution, with all those privileges and immunities which follow from that new relation, may be more appropriately and properly left in the hands of the representatives of that race on this floor. I shall, therefore, yield to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS,] another representative of that race.

Mr. WALLS. Mr. Speaker, the legend, Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, has been well chosen in the past as the watch-word of people seeking a higher plane of manhood and a broader comprehension of the earthly destiny of the human family.

In our own time and country, under an advanced and advancing civilization, there is something more than sentiment in this glittering generality; and in addition to its broader definitions, as interpreted by the republicanism of the past, the leavening influences of even-handed justice gives it a tangible significance alike elevating to the citizens and institutions of the Republic.

In presenting the claim for equal public rights for all citizens, though in behalf of a class who, in common with another class, labor under disabilities, it is but just to assume that the effort is made more in the interest of the Republic and its progress than for the benefit of the people for whose immunity from wrong the movement is seemingly inaugurated.

The Federal Constitution, as amended, wisely provides, (Article 14, section 3:)

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, * * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Admitting, for the sake of reaching the gist of the matter, that no State attempts to make or enforce laws abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, yet it remains to be demonstrated whether there is a denial, tacit or direct, to any person in any State of the equal protection of all law. If so, then the spirit of the provisions of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Federal Constitution is violated, and there is need for the appropriate legislation for the enforcement of the same as provided for in section 5 of said article.

It may be said that there are no positive statutes prohibiting the enjoyment of all public rights by all citizens whose comfort and convenience may be lessened by such prohibition, and who tender the equivalent fixed by law or custom for public facilities.

But if it is found that this denial is made—and I apprehend it is easy of demonstration—by corporations or individuals who exist at the will of the State, then there is need of additional legislation to enforce the spirit of the provisions of the Federal Constitution as amended.

Men may concede that public sentiment, and not law, is the cause of the discrimination of which we justly complain and the resultant disabilities under which we labor.

If this be so, then such public sentiment needs penal correction, and should be regulated by law. Let it be decidedly understood, by appropriate enactment, that the individual rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizens, irrespective of color, to all facilities afforded by corporations, licensed establishments, common carriers, and institutions supported by the public, are sacred, under the law, and that violations of the same will entail punishment safe and certain.

We will then hear no more of a public sentiment that feeds upon the remnants of the rotten dogmas of the past, and seeks a vitality in the exercise of a tyranny both cheap and unmanly.

Let equity, founded in justice, honesty, and right—the soul and spirit of the law—be prescribed by the superior power of the Government, and the inferior compelled to obey. It is the duty of the men of to-day, in whose hands is intrusted the destiny of the Republic, to remove from the path of its upward progress every obstacle which may impede its advance in the future. And while respectfully demanding at their hands the removal of disabilities from colored citizens, we as earnestly commend that all other citizens enjoy the full rights of American citizenship, and that the last vestige of our internal revolution be removed by general amnesty.

That social equality will follow the concession of equal public rights is about as likely as that danger will come to the Republic because of a general amnesty. None present this unreasonable and unnatural argument but those whose political life depends upon the existence of a baseless prejudice wholly unworthy a civilized country and disgraceful to the American people; which, galvanized into fitful life at periodical intervals to accomplish the purposes of individuals whose patriotism and love of country is measured by personal aggrandizement, creates the imperative need of additional legislation.

That the relations of the races will be changed by meting out simple justice to the colored citizen, without infringing upon the rights of any class, is the clap-trap addressed to the ignorant and vicious, and finds no response in the American heart, which in its best impulses rises superior to all groveling prejudices.

In obedience to the exalted sentiment which impelled emancipation, enfranchisement, and equal political equality in the adoption of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth articles of amendment to the Federal Constitution, the nation, through its law-makers, was true to itself and its traditions; and the wisdom of the legislation incorporated in the three several amendments which jointly provide that Congress shall have power to enforce the provisions of these articles by appropriate legislation, is fully worthy the lofty patriotism of the men who were morally brave enough to rise superior to a petty and unworthy prejudice of race, and who were as distinctively American in their representative character as any public men who have enjoyed the confidence and led the public sentiment of the American nation.

It is for this appropriate legislation we plead—for the enforcement of the spirit as well as the letter of the provisions, whose operation disenthralled and regenerated a nation of men who without this needed legislation will not have a fair opportunity to demonstrate their fitness for American citizenship, and to whom the channels of advancement in the legitimate pursuits of life will be forever closed, if by law, prejudice, or indisposition to enforce legal enactment they are branded as a special creation of God for a special inferiority in the physical structure of government. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] in an elaborate argument, for which he says he had made no preparation, assumes some very strong but not new positions.

He asserts that "no one on his side of the House wants the negro oppressed, or deprived of education or any other right guaranteed by the Constitution and laws." This declaration, coming from such an authoritative source, is some indication that the sudden conversion at Baltimore in July, 1872, has taken deeper root than we had been led to suppose from recent events, and that when the solemn pledge of the national convention of the party with which the gentleman affiliates was given in favor of equal civil rights it meant more than platform rhetoric. Still it is difficult to reconcile this kindly declaration with the animus of the gentleman's effort.

We have heard so much of the usurpations of Congress and of drifting toward centralism and consolidation whenever some pet idol of oppression is about to be broken that we need not become exercised for the safety of the country because the gentleman from Kentucky is not happy. The declaration is made that this movement would have been ridiculed by men of all parties ten years ago; to this might have been added, with perfect propriety, that emancipation and enfranchisement would have been ridiculed twenty years ago. This proves nothing but the excellence of the gentleman's memory and the tenacity with which he clings to the obsolete ideas of the past from which progressive men desire to be emancipated.

If the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the New Orleans

Slaughter-house case has any relevancy to this bill it is not as apparent to me as it seems to the gentleman who loves to linger in the legal atmosphere of that body while threatening dreadful things to the country and humanity generally.

As he seems to be lovingly attached to the emanations of this court and also refers to the Dred Scott decision, the key-note of which was that for more than a century previous to the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, negroes, whether slave or free, had been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect, that consequently such persons were not included among the people in the general words of that instrument, it may be proper to remind him and his associates on the other side of the House that if this New Orleans slaughter-house decision is relevant, which I do not concede by any means, that this nation, in its onward march to a broader, higher, and brighter civilization, will not halt any longer to admire the beauties of a Supreme Court decision now than at the time a perverted and blind public sentiment made the Dred Scott decision possible and awoke the nation to the duty of the hour. How well that duty has been performed the introduction of the bill under consideration sufficiently testifies.

This argument of the gentleman would doubtless be of more force in the courts of Kentucky than on the floor of Congress in the latter half of the nineteenth century.

One would suppose that a person born and partly reared and educated in a country which at that time was feeling the benign and grateful influence of the great Wilberforce, who gave his life to the amelioration of the human race, and inaugurated the prohibition of the African slave-trade in the British West India possessions, which culminated, twenty-six years later, in emancipation, would have imbibed some early notions of justice and humanity. But from the position assumed by the gentleman, even since his recent visit to the house of his ancestors, we are forced to the conclusion that the Scottish nature is not susceptible of early impressions, and that it takes its character from accidental surroundings at any period of life. Had the gentleman's footsteps tended toward Massachusetts in early life instead of Kentucky, he would doubtless to-day be standing with Wendell Phillips and other bright spirits of the old Bay State nobly battling for the very principles he now opposes.

We are duly grateful for the gentleman's magnanimity in refraining from incorporating an educational qualification in the statutes of Kentucky; and as it was not deemed advisable to do so prior to the enfranchisement of the colored race, we trust that our appeal for equal rights now will not displease the Legislature of that State. The tenth article of amendment, which the gentleman quotes among other things, sets forth that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Now I would recommend that the gentleman bring his luminous and unbiased mind to a closer study of the Constitution, including all the amendments.

It is creditable to the gentleman's ability that this argument would have been just as conclusive against emancipation and enfranchisement as against civil rights, and it is a matter of congratulation that it will answer just as well for all purposes while there is need of effort for equal rights. The uncharitable aspersion cast upon the national civil rights convention, whose respectful memorial has been presented to Congress, does great injustice to five million people, who, as citizens of the republic, believe they enjoy the right of petition.

His expressed conviction that such conventions will be called in future to enforce miscegenation is alike unworthy the gentleman's intelligence and his experience.

To show the disposition of the controlling influence in some of the States, I take the liberty to call the attention of the House to parts of the inaugural of the governor-elect of Virginia, who, in obedience to the sentiment which succeeded in the late election in that State, declares that he does not hesitate to affirm—

> That so encouraging has been the progress of the last four years; so clearly developed by the past are the obligations of to-day, that if we are but guided by Providence and go forward with courage tempered with forbearance, and if no Federal legislation shall interfere to disturb the relations between the races, we cannot fail to bring our great experiment to a successful and prosperous issue.

He says:

> Recent events prove the futility of attempting to array the colored race as a political combination upon a principle of antagonism between the races; and that as a result of the war the burden of the State is greatly increased in the education of the freedmen and support of colored paupers, * * * * thus leaving Virginia intrusted with the care and education of more than a half-million of the "wards of the nation" without being provided with the means of executing the trust.

He deplores the interference of the Federal Government with the public schools of the State as certain to result in their destruction; and says:

> Yet justice, humanity, the colored race, and the country at large demand that the national Government should furnish the State with the necessary means to educate them.

The position of the governor-elect is somewhat mixed, but I deduce from his premises the fact that he classes the entire colored population of Virginia in the category of paupers, intrusted to the care of the State, or who at least depend upon the State for education and sustenance, and for whom he asks assistance from the General Government, while deprecating the interference of Federal legislation.

Just how he expects this assistance without Federal legislation is not very clear to me. He would convey the idea that an effort has been made to array the colored people of Virginia in hostility to the whites, while the fact is fresh in the memories of all intelligent men that the cry of "A white man's party," and "Virginia for Virginians," was raised by himself and those operating with him in the late gubernatorial canvass. I cannot permit these prejudiced assertions in regard to the colored people of Virginia to go unchallenged; and in their name and in the name of all the colored people of the Republic I protest. No stronger argument has yet been offered for equal civil rights than this of the governor-elect of Virginia.

If the great experiment in that State has had no more prosperous and successful issue in four years than the reduction of the whole colored population to the condition of paupers, then I submit that the interference of Federal legislation will do much toward relieving Virginia of this humiliating trust, by furnishing the facilities instead of the means to educate these "wards of the nation," who are such a burden to that State.

The civil-rights bill now under consideration will open the common schools, lauded so highly by the governor-elect, destroy the prejudices which stand in the way of the indiscriminate employment of the brain-power and bone and sinew of the colored people of Virginia, and give to that Commonwealth, instead of half a million of paupers, the same number of substance-producing, tax-paying citizens.

Instead of issuing bonds to Virginia in trust for the colored people of that State, let Congress give her a chance to modify her customs in conformity with the requirements of the age, and the next four years will be more fruitful of good results than has been the same period just past. In the interest of liberty, justice, humanity, and of the Republic, we ask equal public rights, and concede the equity of general amnesty.

I submit that this question should be taken from the domain of partisan feeling and grappled on the plane of statesmanship, of patriotism, and the common good of the whole country.

Mr. HERNDON obtained the floor, and said: I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CROSSLAND.]

Mr. CROSSLAND. I desire to submit and have printed the following amendment:

> Strike out in lines 15, 16, and 17 of the first section these words: "And the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured, in damages to be recovered in an action of debt."

Mr. HERNDON. Mr. Speaker, I wish in the first place, as preliminary to the argument, to incorporate as part of my remarks the pending bill and amendment, which are as follows:

A bill to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whoever, being a corporation or natural person, and owner, or in charge of any public inn; or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required; or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight; or of any cemetery, or other benevolent institutions, or any public school supported, in whole or in part, at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein, of any citizen of the United States, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000 for each offense; and the person or corporation so offending shall be liable to the citizens thereby injured, in damages to be recovered in an action of debt.

SEC. 2. That the offenses under this act, and actions to recover damages, may be prosecuted before any territorial, district, or circuit court of the United States having jurisdiction of crimes at the place where the offense was charged to have been committed as well as in the district where the parties may reside, as now provided by law.

Amendment proposed to be submitted by Mr. MORRY.

Add to the end of section 2 the following:

And all of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication," passed April 6, 1866, relating to the enforcement of civil rights, with the penalties therein provided, are made applicable in the prosecution of offenses under this act.

Mr. Speaker, the bill and amendment now under discussion presents one of the gravest, most difficult, and comprehensive questions that can arise under our complex system of government. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that it should be forced upon Congress for consideration so soon after the fundamental changes that have been made in our organic law. But it is upon us, and we must summon whatever of courage and ability we may command and meet it like men.

The paramount and controlling question in this measure is: Has Congress the constitutional power to assume jurisdiction and legislate upon the class of subjects presented by it within the States? If the General Government can take cognizance of this character of legislation within the States, then they may do so in advance of any real necessity therefor, whether it be expedient or not—in fact, may do so to restrain and limit the action of the States upon such subjects. Hence the important inquiry is: Does such authority exist in the Constitution? It is not even pretended that such authority existed prior to the adoption of the last three amendments, and if it exists at all, it will be an innovation upon the fundamental principles of our Government as heretofore expounded and understood.

But to properly understand and estimate the changes that have been wrought by these last amendments, I propose to briefly notice some of the more general elementary principles that underlie our system of government, their incompatibility with them, and then discuss the changes made themselves. By this method of inquiry we may find the reasons for the changes that have been deemed necessary, and be the better able to judge of the extent to which they were intended to go.

Mr. Speaker, our system of government, as presented and understood by its framers, was measured in the extent of its powers by, and rested upon, the Constitution as its basis. This Constitution was a written compact by and between the States that signed it. The States that became parties were free and sovereign, and capable of contracting. The Constitution, when signed, embraced all political powers delegated to the General Government, and became the general agent of the States and people to the full extent of its granted powers. The people, before the States or Federal Government were established, possessed all political power in themselves in the aggregate. Sovereignty resided in the people. They created governments for their own benefit. They yielded up a portion of their political powers for the general good of all. They were the source and true fountain of power. Their representative will was reflected in every line of the State and Federal Constitution. The General Government is emphatically a federal, as contradistinguished from a national or consolidated government. And the wisdom of it consists in the perfect distribution of the political powers confided to it. It is strictly a representative, elective, federal government, resting upon concurrent rather than numerical majorities, with the most perfect system of checks, vetoes, and limitations upon power ever before attained in any other government. Under the compact with the States—the Constitution—the Federal Government became in its own orbit coequal with the States. That is, no State was superior to it, but, in fact, it required three-fourths of the States to alter or amend it. The States were not dependent upon the Federal Government for any political power; nor was it dependent upon any one of them after the compact was agreed to. Each became independent in its own appropriate sphere of action and usefulness. Therefore, the States and people reserved all that mass of political powers not granted to the Federal Government, and precise limits were assigned to the Federal Government, beyond which it could not go without an infringement upon those political powers retained by the States and people. And the same compact that gave life to the Federal Government also restrained the States from exercising or ever resisting certain powers which they had parted with in the agreement. Hence, it followed that all that combination of rights and political powers not delegated to the Federal Government, and the exercise of which were not prohibited or retained to the States by it, were, by the compact itself, recognized to stand upon equal dignity, and entitled to the same security and protection as any power or right specially mentioned in the Constitution itself. The object and purpose of this distinct recognition of those rights and powers reserved to the States and people is obvious. The Commonwealths or States that entered into the compact to form a general government well understood the value of home government, and determined that the powers of the States in their corporate capacity should not be diminished or be liable to disintegrate. Local customs, habits, laws, and institutions were to continue as before, and be fostered and encouraged. They were believed to be the life of the States primarily, and of the General Government ultimately. They were to produce the full measure of political manhood and citizenship in the States. They recognized their controlling effect in strengthening that bond of attachment between the citizen and his Government, the ruler and the ruled, without which the strongest of governments, ostensibly, must, in fact, be weak. Local self-government was not only first in the order of time, but in the order of merit. It was the most valuable to the people, and, in their estimation, if either had to fail, it would be better that the Federal Government perish than their local governments. Each State regulated its own local affairs in its own way, independent of other States or the General Government, and in this the people took part, held this right very dear, and never intended that it should be usurped or taken from them.

In fact if what the framers of the Constitution did is any index to what they intended, nothing was more distant from their purpose than to establish a consolidated form of government, which in effect should be a unit, and the States the fractions of that unit, or that the States should bear the same relation to the General Government that the parishes and counties within the States did to the States themselves. They intended that the General Government should be strictly federal, composed of independent integral members, sovereign in themselves. The confederation of these free Commonwealths in a more perfect union increased their strength, secured their protection, and opened a wider field for usefulness, without degrading or destroying the local rights and powers reserved to these States. In fact the mightiest struggles in Western Asia and Europe, for more than two thousand years, have been on the part of the former to overthrow and that of the latter to maintain the great federal idea in government. History so abounds with examples of this kind, and especially that of the Middle Ages and the earlier English history, that the framers of the Constitution must have been well advised of its importance. But to illustrate this idea more concisely, I read from the speech of Mr. Calhoun on the force bill, and his quotation from Mr. Palgrave, of England, on the same subject, both of whom are not unknown to fame:

In reviewing the ground over which I have passed, it will be apparent that the question in controversy involves that most deeply important of all political questions, whether ours is a federal or a consolidated Government; a question on the decision of which depend, as I solemnly believe, the liberty of the people, their happiness, and the place which we are destined to hold in the moral and intellectual scale of nations. Never was there a controversy in which more important consequences were involved, not excepting that between Persia and Greece, decided by the battles of Marathon, Platea, and Salamis; which gave ascendency to the genius of Europe over that of Asia; and which, in its consequences, has continued to affect the destiny of so large a portion of the world even to this day. There are often close analogies between events apparently very remote, which are strikingly illustrated in this case. In the great contest between Greece and Persia, between European and Asiatic polity and civilization, the very question between the federal and consolidated form of government was involved. The Asiatic governments, from the remotest time, with some exception on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, have been based on the principle of consolidation, which considers the whole community as but a unit, and consolidates its powers in a central point. The opposite principle has prevailed in Europe. Greece, throughout all her states, was based on a federal system. All were united in one common but loose bond, and the governments of the several states partook, for the most part, of a complex organization which distributed political power among different members of the community. The same principles prevailed in ancient Italy; and if we turn to the Teutonic race, our great ancestors—the race which occupies the first place in power, civilization, and science, and which possesses the largest and the fairest part of Europe—we shall find that their governments were based on the federal organization, as has been clearly illustrated by a recent and able writer on the British constitution, (Mr. Palgrave,) from whose writings I introduce the following extract:

"In this manner the first establishment of the Teutonic states was effected. They were assemblages of septs, clans, and tribes. They were confederated hosts and armies, led on by princes, magistrates, and chieftains; each of whom was originally independent, and each of whom lost a portion of his pristine independence in proportion as he and his compeers became united under the supremacy of a sovereign, who was superinduced upon the state, first as a military commander, and afterward as a king.

"Yet, notwithstanding this political connection, each member of the state continued to retain a considerable portion of the rights of sovereignty. Every ancient Teutonic monarchy must be considered as a federation; it is not a unit, of which the smaller bodies-politic therein contained are the fractions, but they are the integers, and the state is the multiple which results from them. Dukedoms and counties, burghs and baronies, towns and townships, and shires, form the kingdom; all in a certain degree strangers to each other and separate in jurisdiction, though all obedient to the supreme executive authority. This general description, though not always strictly applicable in terms, is always so substantially and in effect; and hence it becomes necessary to discard the language which has been very generally employed in treating on the English constitution. It has been supposed that the kingdom was reduced into a regular and gradual subordination of government, and that the various legal districts of which it is composed arose from the divisions and subdivisions of the country. But this hypothesis, which tends greatly to perplex our history, cannot be supported by fact; and instead of viewing the constitution as a whole, and then proceeding to its parts, we must examine it synthetically, and assume that the supreme authorities of the state were created by the concentration of the powers originally belonging to the members and corporations of which it is composed."

Mr. Speaker, viewed by the light of history, contemporaneous debates, and the constitutions of both the State and General governments, it would be difficult if not impossible to escape the conclusion that ours was in fact, and so intended to be, a Federal government—one whose political power began with the people as the source, and from there flowed up to the States, and through them as independent organizations to the Federal government; that is, power is traced from the extremities to the center. But a consolidated government is the reverse of this. There the whole government is a unit, with political power fixed and located in the center, from which center, as the fountain or source, political power flows out through the divisions or States down to the people. The difference in the two forms of government and the method of operating them is manifest. In the one the States and people, holding certain checks and limitations, exercise a wholesome restraint upon the action of the general agent; they become the principals; they demand a strict account of the trusts confided to their agent, and they become the forum for the settlement and the judges of all political differences that may arise in the administration of the powers with which the agent is clothed. In the other the opposite condition exists; the seat of power being central, and the government being a unit, the officials become the exponents of that power, and dispense it to strengthen their positions; all accountability from the official to the people ceases. The officials under this character of government exactly change positions with the people, for they become the principals and the people their agents, or, rather, they become the masters and the people the servants. It grasps all subjects of legislation, however local, disregards all State sovereignty, State-rights, and State lines except to mark geographical divisions of territory, and decides all political questions by its own officials as the appropriate tribunal. The people become the mere subjects, dependent upon the good-will of their ruler. They cease to be trusted with self-government, and so far as its influence is concerned to effect good, the ballot-box might be abolished. The locality of political power, as well as the method of ruling, are reversed in the two forms of government. The federal depends upon the good-will, attachment, and love of the governed, and rules through the virtue, intelligence, and capacity for self-government of the people. The consolidated denies the capacity of the people for self-government, will not trust them to aid in the administration of public affairs, declines their advice and counsel, believes them the best subjects when they labor most and grumble least, and rules them with an eye singly to the perpetuation of official power. One rules by love, the other by force. It requires no effort to see that the federal form of government was the one instituted and established by our fathers, and intended to be perpetuated to coming generations. It was the noblest, wisest, and best that had been made by man.

From what has been said concerning the delegated and reserved powers and the limitations upon the exercise of the power of the General and State government, it is clear that no such power as is invoked by this measure could be exercised by Congress while the Constitution with its twelve amendments remained unchanged. And it is equally clear that no such power can now be exercised, unless the most fundamental principle in our system of government has been so far altered as to allow it. For the federal idea is the rock upon which the Consititution itself rests. It is the very life of free government. It is that which, above every other principle, demonstrates the capacity of man for self-government. To overthrow this principle is to defeat the ultimate end of our Government; to relapse into a consolidated despotism, the most cruel and oppressive of all forms of government.

I therefore take it that those who framed and succeeded in adopting the last three amendments to the Constitution did not deliberately intend to overthrow the great leading fundamental principles of our Government, but to make such changes in the organic law as would meet the exigencies produced by the late war. The amending power of the Constitution, it should always be remembered, is remedial in its nature and effects; was never intended to be used as a sword to destroy, but as a shield to protect the original Constitution in its true application to the development of our civilization. Hence the amendments ought to receive an interpretation harmonizing, if practicable, with the fundamental and pervading principles of the entire Constitution.

It is unnecessary to trace the causes that led to and provoked the late war. It is sufficient to say that the insecurity of slave property under the Constitution, and the failure to obtain satisfactory guarantees for its future protection, was the primary and immediate cause that hastened the rupture. This was vital to the South, and if denied or disregarded could not fail to produce the very result that happened—a resort to those sovereign powers held by the States as coequals, and by which they became the judges of the extent of the infraction and of the mode and measure of redress. At the end of this sanguinary struggle, the four million of slaves (about whom the contest was waged) were declared to be free de facto, by virtue of the war measures of the Government, and so continued until the adoption of the thirteenth amendment, when they became free de jure. The object of this amendment was clearly to give freedom to the four million of slaves, but in its scope will secure the freedom of all people from servitude under our Government.

It sanctified those acts done by force and without law, prior to that date, under the pressure of war. This amendment trenched upon the federal system, and invaded to a certain extent the sovereign powers and rights of the States. For it not only denied the right to protection of slave property, but denied the right to the property itself, seized the four millions of slave property, worth four billions of money to the owners, without compensation, and cut off redress either by the owners themselves or the States that were pledged under the compact to afford protection. To this extent the sovereign powers and rights of the States were invaded and absorbed, and what the States lost the General Government gained. The colored people who were declared free by the amendment were not citizens of the States or General Government; and they could not under our system become so except by the separate action of the States. The States delayed to act in the matter, and this delay provoked the action of the General Government. The right to clothe persons with citizenship within the States was one of the reserved rights of the States; it had never been delegated to the Federal Government, and was distinctly recognized in the Constitution itself. The fourteenth amendment was an invasion of the rights of the States to a very large extent. It was intended to cover a mass of legislation, such as civil-rights measures and reconstruction laws, which were not even claimed to be authorized by the Constitution, but were openly violations of its letter and spirit, and which were based upon certain undefined war powers that were said to be inherent in the self-preserving powers of the Government. It laid heavy taxes upon the people of the States without representation; fixed a public debt on the people of eleven States without consent or the power to question it, and decided void all claims for the compensation of slave property. It stripped the States of many rights that were regarded as sacred and even necessary to their independence, and sanctioned, as it was contended, the use of military force in the place of civil remedies to enforce the laws enacted thereunder.

After the colored people became free and the rights of citizenship were enforced, they were still far from the political plane occupied by the whites. They could not vote. The States had always held the exclusive power to confer this great privilege; and it was one of the noblest prerogatives that belonged to sovereignty. This privilege was regarded with so much jealousy and sacredness that it was believed to be the motive power, the great fly-wheel that balanced and regulated the machinery of the State governments. It was thought to furnish a strong check to power. And, therefore, the States cautiously delayed to act, and this delay induced the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, which changes the franchise, which was a privilege accorded by the States, into a right, and a right that emanates from the General Government as well as from the States. It extends not only to the colored people but to all, in its effect, within the jurisdiction of the Government.

These three amendments have, so far as they have gone, trenched upon the reserved rights of the independent sovereign States; deprived the States of the power to abridge them, and to this extent the States have ceased to be the coequals of the General Government; have lost those necessary powers, and the loss of them to the States has lost them to the true federal idea of government itself. The effect has been to infringe upon the federal system. It has gained nothing as a federal system; it has lost in its fundamental idea—in the very essence of its self-preserving power. The gain of those powers lost by the States has been to the consolidating tendency of the Government as distinguished from the federal. For it should be remembered that the wisdom, strength, and vitality of the federal idea is to maintain the States in their independent and sovereign prerogatives and powers; with all local institutions in full force, with unrestricted power to regulate all their internal and local affairs in their own way. If these independent communities should be stripped of all these necessary rights, they would cease to exist as such, and the Federal Government as such would perish with them. The constant tendency of all governments is to grow stronger; to invade the sources of power and absorb all rights and powers reserved to themselves; and this Government is no exception to the rule. It is hastening toward consolidation. Force is rapidly taking the place of that love and attachment which should constitute the rule in governing a free people. It is difficult to draw the line of demarkation between the rights of the States still left and those of the General Government, including those lately absorbed by the three amendments to the Constitution.

But the question before us requires that it be traced as accurately as possible. If we are in fact under a wholly consolidated government, then the power does exist for the passage of this bill. If, however, we have not reached the exact point where the federal system ceases, and the consolidated commences, that point where all sovereign and reserved powers of the States disappear, and the solid unity of a centralized government begins, there may still remain debatable ground. And whether the advancement that the Government has made by these organic changes toward a national centralized form has been sufficient to render it more consolidated than federal, I shall not now attempt to determine. But what I want to show is, that although the federal system has been infringed, that it has suffered loss, that this loss has been a loss to liberty itself, that still there remains intact much of the old federal system, which rests upon the Constitution for its security and protection, and which it is our bounden duty to maintain in all its purity and force. For even a part of the federal system, with a part of the consolidated ingrafted, is far better than the whole of the consolidated. And in my opinion the liberties of the people of this country depend upon which one of these systems shall be adopted and enforced.

It is claimed by the friends of the bill that the authority exists in the first section of the fourteenth amendment for its passage, and which reads as follows:

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

This section was drawn in question in the late Slaughter-house cases from Louisiana and received a judicial construction by the Supreme Court, (16 Wallace,) and a few extracts will serve to show the extent to which the amendment was intended to go toward the taking away or restoring of State rights. I read from 16 Wallace, page 73:

To remove this difficulty primarily, and to establish a clear and comprehensive definition of citizenship which should declare what should constitute citizenship of the United States and also citizenship of a State, the first clause of the first section was framed.

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

The first observation we have to make on this clause is, that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State; and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase "subject to its jurisdiction" was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States.

The next observation is more important, in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual. We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection of the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the word citizen of the State should be left out, when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested; for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

Also from the same report, in the same cases, I read from the dissenting opinion of the minority of the court, both the majority and minority agreeing upon the precise construction of the first section of the fourteenth amendment, as follows:

The first section of the fourteenth amendment is alone involved in the consideration of these cases. No searching analysis is necessary to eliminate its meaning. Its language is intelligible and direct. Nothing can be more transparent. Every word employed has an established signification. There is no room for construction. There is nothing to construe. Elaboration may obscure, but cannot make clearer, the intent and purpose sought to be carried out.

1. Citizens of the States and of the United States are defined.

2. It is declared that no State shall, by law, abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

3. That no State shall deprive any person, whether a citizen or not, of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

A citizen of a State is ipso facto a citizen of the United States. No one can be the former without being also the latter; but the latter, by losing his residence in one State without acquiring it in another, although he continues to be the latter, ceases, for the time, to be the former. "The privileges and immunities" of a citizen of the United States include, among other things, the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property, and also the rights which pertain to him by reason of his membership of the nation. The citizen of a State has the same fundamental rights as a citizen of the United States, and also certain others, local in their character, arising from his relation to the State, and in addition those which belong to the citizen of the United States, he being in that relation also.

There may thus be a double citizenship, each having some rights peculiar to itself. It is only over those which belong to the citizen of the United States that the category here in question throws the shield of its protection. All those which belong to the citizen of a State, except as to bills of attainder, ex post facto laws and laws impairing the obligation of contracts, are left to the guardianship of the bills of rights, constitutions, and laws of the States respectively. Those rights may all be enjoyed in every State by the citizens of every other State by virtue of clause 2, section 4, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States as it was originally framed. This section does not in anywise effect them; such was not its purpose.

It is clear from the construction placed upon this section by the Supreme Court, the entire court agreeing touching the exact point under consideration, that a second or double citizenship was established by the first section of the amendment; and that the two citizenships depended upon different characteristics and looked to different sources for protection. The office of this amendment was not to destroy or curtail that citizenship that already existed under the exclusive action of the States. Nor was it to deprive the States of the power to still secure and protect it in their own way. But the true intent was to add something new, to enlarge the scope of Federal power, to create a distinct citizenship of the United States as contradistinguished from that of the States, and in that might be independent of the action of the States. It was to supply a supposed defect which had always been regarded by many able statesmen as a source of weakness in our system. When this new citizenship was established it was quite natural that it should depend upon the creator of it for security and protection. For the same reason the citizenship of the States should depend upon the laws and constitutions of the States for its protection. The two in this sense are not incompatible. Both may exist and neither destroy the other, the national citizenship being under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and that of the States under theirs.

And the interpretation given to clause 1, section 2, article 4, of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," is not inconsistent with the view here entertained; but rather adds force to it.

In Washington's Circuit Court Reports, volume 4, page 371, Mr. Justice Washington says:

The inquiry is, what are the prvileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may all, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may prescribe for the general good of the whole.

These are the rights that appertain to the citizens of each State as individuals, and are declared to be fundamental. And the Supreme Court again, in the case of Ward vs. The State of Maryland, in speaking of this subject say:

They are, in the language of Judge Washington, those rights which are fundamental. Throughout his opinion they are spoken of as rights belonging to the individual of a State. They are so spoken of in the constitutional provision which he was construing. And they have always been held to be the class of rights which the State governments were created to establish and secure.

And again, quoting from the opinion of the Supreme Court, 16 Wallace, page 77, when referring to clause 1, section 2, article 4, of the Constitution, they say:

The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights, which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the State in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the State governments over the rights of its own citizens. Its sole purpose was to declare to the several States that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

And the court, further remarking on those rights and the ultimate extent to which this amendment was intended to reach, say:

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But, with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions—when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character—when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State governments for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, which no State can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

From those explicit views of the courts it will be seen, that all those rights, privileges, and immunities described, and which are declared to be fundamental, appertain to the citizens of the States, and are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the State governments.

To give a construction to the amendment that would embrace all the rights, privileges, and immunities that belong to citizens of the General Government as such, and also embrace all those that belong to the citizens of the States, with the necessary power in Congress to follow them up to their full extent, and protect them by legislation, would be to overthrow the federal system of government, which rests upon its "free, sovereign, and independent" members. The States would be left without any of those substantial constituent elements of political power that go to make up sovereignty, and the federal system would cease to exist for the want of free local governments to support it. But the inquiry will be made, if a citizen of a State can claim all of these rights, privileges, and immunities, and protection for them under the Constitution, bill of rights, and laws of each State, then what are those that appertain to the citizen of the United States? Most of those rights may be found in the Constitution, amendments, and treaties with foreign nations. I will mention a few of them that belong to the citizen of the General Government: The right of habeas corpus, trial by jury, free exercise of religious worship, free speech, free press, to assemble and discuss public measures, to petition for redress, security against unreasonable searches and seizures, to go and return from the seat of Government, access to the courts, to have counsel, to hold office, aid in administering public affairs, access to the several Departments of Government for business, to all navigable waters and sea-ports within the jurisdiction of the Government, to protection for life, liberty, and property on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of foreign governments, the right to become a citizen of any State by residence therein, to be exempt from servitude, the right to vote, and of "not being deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." All of these, and others not enumerated, may be now asserted by a citizen of the United States, and be secured in them by the whole power of the Government, though such person be not a citizen of any State.

There are two conditions of citizenship. In the one case he may be a citizen of both by being a citizen of one. In the other, by being a citizen of the one he has the right to become a citizen of the other by actual residence. And accordingly as a person accepts the one condition or the other all those privileges, rights, and immunities attach. And it does not matter that the person be colored or of the African race; he occupies no higher place than the white race.

The powers of the General Government, therefore, can only be invoked and brought to bear to protect the rights, immunities, and privileges of that national citizenship that lies within its appropriate sphere. And if these are not infringed or violated by the States, no legislation will be necessary on the part of Congress. This view maintains the dignity of our Federal system of Government, without doing violence to the amendment itself.

And the conclusion here reached will be greatly strengthened when it is remembered that some of the leading statesmen of the republican party, who even go so far as to deny all State sovereignty yet declare in favor of State rights; drawing a distinction between State rights and State sovereignty, repudiating the latter and sustaining the former.

In a speech delivered by Senator MORTON at Athens, Ohio, August 23, 1873, in laying down the doctrines of his party on this subject, he is reported to have said:

THE TRUE NATIONAL IDEA.

Now, what do I oppose to this doctrine? I assume that this Government was formed by the people of the United States in their aggregate and primary capacity. I assume that instead of there being thirty-seven nations there is but one; instead of there being thirty-seven sovereignties there is but one sovereignty. There is a vast body of State rights guaranteed and secured by the Constitution of the United States—by the same Constitution that created and upholds the Government of the United States; that these State rights have the same guarantee that the rights of the national Government have, are equally entitled to the protection of the Supreme Court, and that one set of rights is just as sacred as the other.

Some confound the ideas of State sovereignty and State rights as being one and the same thing, and seem to suppose that State rights are only consistent with State sovereignty; while I assume that State rights are consistent with national sovereignty, and are safest under protection of the nation.

The Constitution gives one class of rights to the Government of the United States. They are specified, and they carry with them the powers that are necessary to their full execution and enjoyment. The rest are to be held and enjoyed by the States, or reserved to the people.

THE CONSTITUTION THE AGREEMENT OF THE NATION.

The States have their rights by the agreement of the nation. That seems to be the important truth that is so often overlooked—that the rights of the States, sacred and unapproachable, are so by the agreement of the nation as much as are the powers that are conferred upon the Government of the United States.

In the consideration of this question we must reflect that the nation had assembled in convention in 1787 and there formed a government, there declared what rights should be given to the national Government, and what rights should be reserved to the States; and that in either case the grant and guarantee are an act of national sovereignty by the whole people in convention assembled. When we shall embrace this idea fully all the danger of centralization will pass away, though we discard the idea of State sovereignty.

SENTIMENT OF NATIONALITY.

The idea that we are a nation—that we are one people—should be a plank in the platform of every party. It should be the central idea of American politics, and every child should be, so to speak, vaccinated with this idea, that he may be protected from the political distemper that has brought such calamity upon our country. The man who does not possess the sentiment of nationality is intellectually and morally weak in many of the great positions and trials of life.

It is an element of strength and courage to feel that you belong to a great nation—especially to a nation that loves liberty better than any other, and is not surpassed in wealth, power, and valor. Two men met in Paris during the war, and were introduced. One said, "I am a citizen of the United States;" to which the other replied, "I am a citizen of Virginia, sir," "Ah, Virginia; that is a small part of my country, that has been a good deal cursed with slavery and the abstractions of State rights."

When the mind of the nation is fully saturated with the sentiment of nationality—that we are but one people—there will be no danger, though our boundaries come to embrace the entire continent.

THE FAR-REACHING INFLUENCE.

What the sun is in the heavens, diffusing light, and life, and warmth, and by its subtle influence holding the planets in their orbits and preserving the harmony of the universe, such is the sentiment of nationality in a people, diffusing life and protection in every direction, holding the faces of Americans always toward their homes, protecting the States in the exercise of their just powers, and preserving the harmony of all.

We must have a nation. It is a necessity of our political existence. We should cherish the idea that while the States have their rights, sacred and inviolable, which we should guard with untiring vigilance, never permitting an encroachment upon them, and remembering that such encroachment is as much a violation of the Constitution of the United States as to encroach upon the rights of the General Government, still bearing in mind that the States are but subordinate parts of one great nation—that the nation is over all, even as God is over the universe.

Here is the doctrine announced that this is a national and not a Federal Government; that there exists but one sovereign power, that of the national Government, and that the States possess no sovereignty. No statesman has gone further than this toward consolidation. Still, with these ultra views he declares that there is a vast body of rights belonging to the States that are sacred and inviolable and resting upon the guarantees of the Constitution for their preservation. As to what those rights belonging to the States are has been fully shown from the highest authority, and it is fair to infer that those rights were referred to by the speaker as constituting that mass that belonged to the States. Hence it follows that it would be repugnant to the plainest principles of the Constitution, as well as violative of the Federal system itself, for the General Government to invade the domain of the States and take jurisdiction of that class of legislation which is within the exclusive control of the States.

Examine the subjects mentioned in this bill, and then apply the construction given the first section of the fourteenth amendment, and answer if Congress can take cognizance of them. Is legislation by Congress on these subjects necessary to protect the citizen of the national Government in his privileges, rights, and immunities as defined by the Supreme Court? Did it intend to control the States in regulating their hotels, places of entertainment and amusement, their public carriers of passengers and freights, their cemeteries, almshouses, asylums, and churches, and their public schools, or those endowed for public use? These subjects are strictly local in their character, are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the States, and constitute a part of those rights that should be held sacred and inviolable under the Constitution. There could not well be concurrent authority exercised over them. The rule is, when Congress takes jurisdiction the States lose it. And if jurisdiction is assumed over these local subjects, then what others remain that would not fall under the same power? The right once conceded to extend thus far, and who will set bounds to this grasping power? If these are drawn within the scope and control of Congress, it is safe to predict that all others will be when interest or desire may dictate. Sir, if this measure becomes a law it will confirm that opinion which has been so much strengthened of late, that this Government cannot be arrested in its rapid march to final consolidation. There will be but one hope left to those who love our matchless Federal system, and that is that the Supreme Court will stay the storm which threatens to overthrow the fundamental principles of free government on this continent.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us very briefly notice some of the effects that will likely flow from the passage of this bill. That it will seriously affect, if not destroy, the patronage in many localities that now maintains places of entertainment, amusement, and benevolent institutions, I do not doubt. But the most serious blow will fall upon public the schools at the South. I believe it will crush them. Every Southern State has adopted a system of public schools, in all of which the negro is well provided for. The whites pay nearly all the taxes, and allow him to share equally with them in the benefits, but in separate schools. If the negro demands to mix with the whites in the schools, it will either be refused or the school itself will fall. No party can be kept in power that will favor equality in the schools. If it is to be forced upon them, then they will levy and collect no taxes, and although the school law will remain, the schools themselves will languish and die for want of money. Who will suffer most? The poor whites will suffer some, but they are thrifty and will join with the rest and provide private schools. But the negro, without money, and without economy to save any, will be unable to provide a school at his own expense, and the public schools will have failed, and thus he will prove to be the chief sufferer. It is said that this is caused by prejudice of the old masters against the colored race; that they are malicious toward them and seek to keep the negro under. There is one fact that proves how false this is, that the negroes generally prefer to labor for their old masters, and never seem more contented and happy than when they are under their control. There is a well-settled belief at the South that the negro, for want of social training, moral habits, and education, is unfitted to associate with the whites on terms of equality. No amount of persuasion, argument, or public law can dislodge this conviction, because it is based upon a life of experience with them, and a full knowledge of their nature and habits. The present race is believed there not to be the equal of the whites intellectually, morally, or socially. And the reasons for the difference are solid, abundant, and convincing. For many generations they have been slaves, without encouragement, training, opportunity, education, social life, or positions for public station, or even, in many cases, the blessings of Christian teaching, while the whites have enjoyed all these privileges with all the refinements of the arts and sciences, philosophy and religion, and have been brought up in the midst of a blaze of civilization. Under these influences the one race has steadily advanced while the other has remained in ignorance and darkness. No one can foresee what the negro race may be by a long course of training. He may equal the white race and surpass it in all those noble qualities that constitute true manhood; but I cannot, with my knowledge of him, believe that he will ever outstrip the whites. And if this be true, that he is not at the present the equal of the white race, why should he be forced upon terms of equality with the whites? It seems to be a malicious desire to inflict disgrace and punishment upon the whites, to wound their sense of social pride and manhood, to reduce them to the necessity of social intercourse with them.

This bill is a direct assault upon our social system. The negro race has never been admitted to it, because known to be unfitted for it. It is intended, in its consequences at least, either to crush out the present system of social life, or secure to the blacks terms of social equality. Man cannot attain his full measure of manhood except in society. He is impelled to embrace it by a law of his being. It lies at the foundation of government, and should be protected by it. And this, as a standard of society, whether high or low, exactly measures the real qualities of the government in which it exists. If it becomes disorganized and distempered, it will reflect its own image in the government itself. The overthrow of the fundamental principles that rule the social system in any country will produce anarchy in the government. Hence the wisest statesmanship has always been seen most prominent in securing and protecting the social system of communities. For when order and harmony reign here, peace and good government follow.

Then what can this great Government hope to gain by disturbing society in at least eleven States of the Union? When present and prospective evil will flow from it, why commit the act? It is useless and even malicious to say that, if the negro race is not the equal of the whites, the late masters are responsible for their ignorance. This is not true. The whole nation is responsible. But this affords no excuse to inflict either disgrace or punishment upon the present generation. We cannot amend the wrong, if done, by degrading our race now. I would not willingly deny the negro any legal or political right. I would not oppress him myself or willingly see him oppressed. I want to see him trained, educated, elevated, and qualified, intellectually and morally, to perform his duties as a good citizen. I will go as far toward securing his equal protection in all political rights before the law as the Constitution will warrant. But I am unwilling to legislate him into our social system on terms of equality with the white race. Nothing can be more social in its effects than the association of the two races at schools and places of entertainment, amusement, and benevolent institutions; and the measure will be viewed as nothing short of an insidious attack upon the rules of our social order that now debar the negro. Eight million whites cannot elevate the four million blacks to their standard by stooping in degradation to their level of superstition, vice, and ignorance. All history has proven that such attempts have resulted in the ruin of the stronger and more refined race. Those who put themselves upon terms of social equality with the negro race will remain on a level with them.

But there is one other consideration of much importance that ought not to be overlooked. This bill and the amendment fixes severe fines and penalties, cognizable exclusively in the Federal courts. These courts should, I admit, be co-extensive with the Federal laws; but they were intended under the Constitution to be courts of strictly limited jurisdiction. The real object of this limited power was to preserve the local courts of the States in the full and unrestricted exercise of all those judicial powers with which they are clothed in the States; for the rule is, that when the Federal courts take jurisdiction, Federal law being paramount, the State courts lose it. Each tribunal should be confined strictly to subjects within its appropriate jurisdiction. It is easy to see the dangerous effect of enlarging the powers and jurisdiction of these courts. By the late acts of Congress, since the war—those of 9th April, 1866, March 2, 1867, July 27, 1868, May 31, 1870, February 28, 1871, and April 20, 1871—the jurisdiction and powers of these courts have been so widened and enlarged that they have almost ceased to be courts of limited powers. It is now more difficult to enumerate those subjects over which they have not got jurisdiction than those that they exercise authority over. At this point more than any other the federal system of government has been attacked; for if the State tribunals are restrained and limited, and their powers absorbed by the Federal courts, just to the extent they are trenched upon does the federal system and the States themselves sustain a loss. This law will introduce a new rule—that of admitting citizens of the same State to litigate in the Federal courts—which will destroy, to the extent it goes, that limitation heretofore recognized upon their powers. But the amendment will add the penalties and method of enforcing the law found under the act of 9th April, 1866, that is, inflicting severe penalties by section 2, and by sections 8 and 9 authorizing the President to direct special courts to be held, and to enforce these rights by military power. I will read the law:

SEC. 2. Any person who, under color of any law, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State or Territory to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having at any time been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party has been duly convicted, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 8. Whenever the President of the United States shall have reason to believe that offenses have been or are likely to be committed against the provisions of this act within any judicial district, it shall be lawful for him, in his discretion, to direct the judge, marshal, and district attorney of such district to attend at such place within the district, and for such time as he may designate, for the purpose of the more speedy arrest and trial of persons charged with a violation of this act; and it shall be the duty of every judge or other officer, when any such requisition shall be received by him, to attend at the place and for the time therein designated.

SEC. 9. It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of this act.

Comment is unnecessary; these sections of law speak for themselves. Can our federal system be maintained where one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government—the judiciary—is placed under the domination of the sword in the hands of the Executive? Can liberty exist and a people be free under such an invasion of their local and sovereign rights, that are as sacred as the Constitution itself?

This law expresses a total want of confidence in the people. Their plainest rights are to be disregarded. The rule of law is to be again supplanted by that of the sword; peace and order to again yield to confusion and anarchy. Institutions that have stood the test of war and pillage are to bow before the encroachments of grasping political power. A people thus wrecked and despoiled will not fail to remember with scorn those who have plotted their ruin. These rights once conferred, with the courts open to enforce them, the negro in many localities will demand them to their fullest extent; and I do not doubt but that they will be refused. The blacks will then go to the towns and cities for refuge and to file legal proceedings. They will fear to return to their labor. Thus thousands will congregate in the towns and cities and become a charge upon the whites. Our poor-houses, jails, and penitentiaries will swarm with the most worthless of the race; and, sir, it will break up the labor system in such districts. It is not remunerative now, and the farming interest in the negro districts is to-day actually disintegrating, because the system of labor is so uncertain. This will make it more so. The effect will be felt in agriculture, commerce, and all the industries of the country. And who will prove the real sufferers? The black race. For as sure as this state of things shall come to pass, the whites will combine to introduce a new and better system of labor by the importation of whites, and thus in the end the severest blow will fall upon the negro you seek to benefit.

But, Mr. Speaker, I greatly fear that if this measure should become a law it will lessen that estimate and confidence that the country ought to have in the wisdom and integrity of her public men, as well as weaken that chord of attachment that binds the ruler to the ruled; that it will tend to if not destroy that love our people entertain for local self-government and home institutions, which are the very essence of free government; that it will cause the people to grow docile and contented under the overshadowing and destructive encroachments of national power; that it will unsettle the fundamental and essential ideas of our Federal Government, and show the possibility if not the fact of a radical change in the system; that Congress would invade the rightful domain of the States by its enactment, and curtail the lawful and constitutional powers of all State judicial tribunals, cannot admit of doubt; that no subject of State home legislation will be after this considered secure and beyond the reach of the General Government; that not only State-rights as a "body," heretofore so sacredly grounded on the Constitution, would perish, but State sovereignty will go down with them. The Constitution itself, with the great fundamental federal idea that has withstood so many revolutions of faction, public opinion, internal divisions, party annihilations, and sanguinary struggles, will remain a violated compact. And what can compensate for all this? Who will be able to pacify the outraged and indignant millions that will spring to their feet to condemn this fratricidal act? Who will offer a sufficient sacrifice to atone for the wide-spread ruin produced? Depend upon it, if this measure becomes a law, it will constitute a distinct plank in the next national presidential platform, and it will prove a millstone that will grind to powder the prospects of success of that party that carries the responsibility of its enactment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, obtained the floor, and said: Mr. Speaker, I had intended to spend the twenty minutes allotted to me in discussing the merits of the measure now before the House; but at the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PURMAN] I will, with the permission of the House, yield my time to him.

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am profoundly grateful to the gentleman from Virginia for affording me this opportunity to put myself, in sentiment and expression, upon record on this question which so vitally affects our constituents.

It would seem to be a work of supererogation on the part of members to enter into the debate of this "civil and legal rights bill," judging from the platform of political principles enunciated by both parties in their late State and national conventions.

Both parties have declared, in solemn asseveration, their adhesion to the doctrine and the constitutional amendments guaranteeing to all the citizens of the United States equal and exact equality before the law, and the enjoyment of all the rights and benefits of government. My willing and confiding constituents, and all my honorable colleagues on this floor, sent here by a similar confiding constituency, expect, in the simplicity of hope, and from such overwhelming past assurances, that the honorable Representatives of both political parties in this Congress will emulate each other in securing the early passage of the act under consideration as a triumphant proof of the sincerity of their declarations. We have not doubted such sincerity; but are sanguine that on this question, as on all others, the conviction will prevail that "honesty is the best policy."

Here I might stop, in justice to the measure and our expectations; but a brief review of honest promises may give no offense, and may serve as a gentle stimulant to their speedy fulfillment.

SAMPLES OF PROFESSIONS FROM DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

New York democratic convention, October 4, 1871:

2. That we recognize the emancipation of the freedmen of the South, and their enfranchisement and perfect equality before the law, as the inevitable sequence of the civil war and of the overthrow of the rebellion against the Union; and we hold it to be the duty of all to sustain them in the enjoyment of their established rights, and to aid them in promoting their own welfare and the general prosperity of the country.

Ohio democratic convention, June 1, 1871:

2. * * * And that, as thus constructed, the democratic party pledges itself to a full, faithful, and absolute execution and enforcement of the Constitution as it now is, so as to secure rights to all persons under it, without distinction of race, color, or condition.

Tennessee democratic convention, May 9, 1872:

3. That we recognize * * * the equality of all men before the law, and an equal participation of all citizens in the rights and benefits of government.

Thus we see that the democratic party of New York, which had the distinction of furnishing the democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1872, and that same party in Ohio, which furnished the national platform of principles for that presidential campaign, led the advance in these strides of progress toward justice and a better statesmanship, and other similar State conventions followed in the new wake, until the 10th day of July, 1872, the democratic party, in national convention assembled in the city of Baltimore, solemnly promulgated the following new articles of political faith, namely:

We, the democratic electors of the United States, in convention assembled, do present the following principles, already adopted at Cincinnati, as essential to just government:

1st. We recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of Government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all, of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political.

IS NOT WILLING TO DOUBT THEIR SINCERITY IN FACE OF THESE RECENT ASSEVERATIONS.

Would it not be unreasonable for any honest man, in view of the foregoing promulgations, to doubt that the democratic Representatives in this House, who were elected upon this Baltimore platform, are only awaiting with eagerness the first opportunity to make good their pledges to the country? I do not doubt them; neither will I say on this occasion, "Wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them."

To the republican party, which now has such a large majority in both Houses of this Congress, our constituents confidently look for this last signal act which will clothe them in such complete panoply of citizenship that their fruition of all legal rights and privileges appertaining to all other citizens of the Republic will never more be questioned.

This act is essentially and speedily called for, as it is apparent to every thinking man that a semi-class of citizens, without certainty in the present or security for the future, are ever an element of weakness and demoralization in the country.

FROM THE POWER OF JUSTICE DELIVERANCE MUST COME.

But not from these considerations of mere policy is this last and crowning meed to be born. No! Justice, that voice of God, which spoke emancipation out of the thunders and lightnings of war, and decreed through the enlightened sentiment of this Government that next step of civil and political enfranchisement, is still potent in tones, and will not cease its appeal to the wisdom and conscience of the country until all the blessings emanating from the Constitution and laws shall fall as equally and impartially upon all citizens as does the sunlight of heaven.

When the republican party in Philadelphia, on June 6, 1872, in national convention assembled, declared the following as a portion of its platform of principles it was no new article of faith, expressed in new language, but one of its most vital principles of civil liberty and just government:

3. Complete liberty and exact equality in the enjoyment of all civil, political, and public rights should be established and effectually maintained throughout the Union by efficient and appropriate State and Federal legislation. Neither the law nor its administration should admit any discrimination in respect of citizens by reason of race, creed, color, or previous condition of servitude.

And when he who now stands ablest in war, truest in peace, and enshrined by the side of our first President in the hearts of his countrymen, gave to the country the following in his letter of acceptance, it contained the same honesty and tenacity of purpose as that memorable sentence, "I will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer."

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 10, 1872.

With the expression of a desire to see a speedy healing of all bitterness of feeling between sections, parties, or races of citizens, and the time when the title of citizen carries with it all the protection and privileges to the humblest that it does to the most exalted, I subscribe myself, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

U. S. GRANT.

RELIES UPON PROMISES OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY FOR FINAL TRIUMPH.

Here I might stop again, and rest our cause, with a firm reliance upon the integrity and purpose of the republican party to consummate this last climax of justice toward this class of citizens, who were born upon American soil, obtained their freedom in the usual historical manner of all people—by valor and the law, and whose legal citizenship was intended to be equal and perfect by the Constitution that conferred it. Shall native-born citizens have less rights and benefits in their own country than those who come here invited and welcomed from foreign lands?

Shall hostile legislation in States be permitted to oppress any class of citizens on account of religion, nativity, politics, or complexion, or deny to any such class their inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and thus defeat the very spirit and provision of the Constitution itself?

This great charter of our rights, which safely withstood the gigantic assaults of the sword, must not now be circumvented by the sounding technicalities of peace.

JUSTICE AGAINST STATE-RIGHTS.

And this brings our cause face to face with the question of State rights—or State sovereignty, which would be the most undisguised term. From this stand-point, the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] informed the House, the only opposition to this bill will arise.

Into the camp of State sovereignty, then, the friends of this measure must enter, if our opponents prefer to withdraw from the common field of justice and constitutional law.

But justice is the light from divine truth, more or less clear according to the understanding of the mind and the willingness of the conscience to be in unison with it, while State sovereignty is an ancient political speculation, exploded under the tread of modern events and the advent of the nation's dispensation.

The one is God's free landscape of nature for human philosophy to develop and produce fruit upon, while the other is the shattered fortification of a human theory, but no longer affording invincible protection to its few honest veterans.

Justice consists in doing no injury to men, or, in the copious language of the great expounder of the Constitution, Daniel Webster—

Justice is the great interest of man on earth.

It is the ligament which holds civilized beings and civilized nations together. Wherever her temple stands, and as long as it is duly honored, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, and the improvement and progress of our race. And whoever labors on this edifice with usefulness and distinction, whoever clears its foundations, strengthens its pillars, adorns its entablatures, or contributes to raise its august dome still higher in the skies, connects himself in name, in fame, and character with that which is and must be as durable as the frame of human society.

FUNDAMENTAL CHANGES IN THE CONSTITUTION SINCE THE WAR.

Since the eventful civil war through which the country passed, great and fundamental additions have been made to the national Constitution, known as the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and which were necessary as foundations upon which to re-establish society and civil and political governments in the disrupted section.

The greatest epoch in our history as a nation brought forth these amendments, which I hope will be the only lasting monuments of our fratricidal war.

In the light of these new amendments we must look for the wand to touch this vital question, whether or not the State has the right to array itself in legal hostility or discrimination against any class of its citizens.

Section 1 of the fourteenth amendment is as follows:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I also quote the following extracts from a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Louisiana Slaughter-house case:

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

* * * * * * *

Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

NATIVE-BORN CITIZENS.

In the light of this amendment, aided by this lucid decision of the Supreme Court of the United States—and in these we have authoritative guidance—let us examine the status of this class of citizens for whom their representatives are here pleading. These persons were born in the United States, and are therefore citizens of the United States by the irrevocable pronunciation of the Constitution and the Supreme Court of the United States.

The vast majority of these persons reside in the Southern States, are voters therein, and hold office, and therefore, by virtue of this same Constitution and decision, are also citizens of the State wherein they reside, and hereafter are subject only to such legislative regulations as may be prescribed for all classes of citizens therein.

The day and power of discrimination against them passed away when they became identified with the mass of citizens in their respective States.

When all are equal, where is lodged the right to enforce any condition of inequality? There is lodged in the breast or power of equals no such right; it would be might, and its exercise usurpation.

POWERS RESERVED TO THE STATES OR THE PEOPLE.

In the unexplored boundary of reserved powers belonging to the States is it pretended that any real authority, or even pretext, could be evoked which would justify, in view of the liberty and spirit of our institutions, any State legislature in the passage of such laws as follow:

SUPPOSED ACTS OF A STATE-RIGHTS LEGISLATURE.

An act to prohibit all white persons, not citizens of and not residing within the State, from being admitted and accommodated in any public inn.

An act to exclude all persons not possessed of real and personal property to the value of ten thousand dollars from all places of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required.

An act to exclude all persons of the religious denomination known as Methodists from riding on any line of stage-coaches, railroads, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight.

An act to prohibit all foreign-born citizens and their descendants from being buried in any public cemetery.

An act to exclude all children not clothed in velvet and such as have blue eyes from admission into any public school supported by public taxation.

An act to exclude all persons known as the "colored race" from public inns, cemeteries, and common schools supported by public taxation, and from equal accommodations with other persons, on all public stage-coaches, steamboats, and railroads.

RESPONSE TO SUCH PRETENDED LAWS.

Against the first five of these supposed laws the spirit and condemnation of the whole country would cry aloud.

The executive authorities of the other States would kindly call the attention of such State-rights legislature to section 2, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Does the colored citizen of Massachusetts, sojourning in most of the Southern States, either for business or pleasure, receive or enjoy all the privileges and immunities of "citizens in the (those) several States?"

The religious press and sentiment of the country would thunder their anathemas against this legislature, until the very stars would join the throng and flash out their fiery indignation at such intolerable outrage upon our religious freedom, and petitions, numerous as the autumn leaves, would come into this Capitol from the Christian churches, praying Congress to perform its duty under section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, by guaranteeing to such State, for the benefit of the minority of its wronged citizens, a republican form and administration of government.

And the outrage against humanity, in excluding the innocent children of the poor, and such as were born with blue eyes without any volition of their own, from the blessed benefits of an education, what punishment from Heaven would not the prayers of all good people invoke upon the heads of the heartless authors? These are the weakest and dearest of the human family—the little children—"but strong in their very weakness and from the irrepressible sympathies of good men which, by divine compensation come to succor the weak."

And against the sixth act, which is not supposed now for illustration, but is virtually in existence in most of the States of the Union, especially in the Southern States, with a modification of that portion relating to the public schools, and which is the hostile pretended legislation that the passage of the bill under consideration will wipe out, freedom, justice, citizenship, and the Constitution stand forever arrayed.

For what is Freedom but the unfettered use
Of all the powers which God for use has given.

CENTRAL POWER OF NATIONAL GOVERNMENT OVER ERRING STATES.

It is singular that in this enlightened age of the world, and especially under the influence of our boasted civil and political liberties, that citizens of the United States because of their nativity, and at the same time citizens of their respective States because of their life-long residence therein, should be subjected to such intolerance and injustice as to call for and need the protecting arm of the national Government. And this is the saving feature in our beautiful system of government, that while States may err in prejudice or passion, the national Government will rectify and save through the exercise of a parental love and power. That while our States, like planets in the solar system, are revolving with a centrifugal force and deriving the benefits from the laws of their being, they are majestically kept in their spheres by the centripetal force of the central luminary or government from which spring that sunshine, warmth, and fructification which alone make us a nation.

EXERCISE OF PROTECTION OVER THIS CLASS OF OPPRESSED CITIZENS BY NATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

The national Government exercised its parental power for the protection of this class of oppressed citizens before to-day, and when the Legislature of Virginia passed and attempted to enforce its flagitious vagrant act, the representative of this Government, General Terry, stopped its enforcement by the following historical orders:

[General Orders, No. 4.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA,
Richmond, January 24, 1866.

By a statute passed at the present session of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled "A bill providing for the punishment of vagrants," it is enacted, among other things, that any justice of the peace, upon the complaint of any one of certain officers therein named, may issue his warrant for the apprehension of any person alleged to be a vagrant, and cause such person to be apprehended and brought before him; and that if upon due examination said justice of the peace shall find that such person is a vagrant within the definition of vagrancy contained in said statute, he shall issue his warrant directing such person to be employed for a term not exceeding three months, and by any constable of the county wherein the proceedings are had be hired out for the best wages which can be procured, his wages to be applied to the support of himself and his family.

The said statute further provides, that in case any vagrant so hired shall during his term of service run away from his employer without sufficient cause, he shall be apprehended on the warrant of a justice of the peace and returned to the custody of his employer, who shall then have, free from any other hire, the services of such vagrant for one month in addition to the original terms of hiring, and that the employer shall then have power, if authorized by a justice of the peace, to work such vagrant with ball and chain.

The said statute specifies the persons who shall be considered vagrants and liable to the penalties imposed by it.

Among those declared to be vagrants are all persons who, not having the wherewith to support their families, live idly and without employment, and refuse to work for the usual and common wages given to other laborers in the like work in the place where they are.

In many counties of this State meetings of employers have been held and unjust and wrongful combinations have been entered into for the purpose of depressing the wages of the freedmen below the real value of their labor, far below the prices formerly paid to masters for labor performed by their slaves.

By reason of these combinations wages utterly inadequate to the support of themselves and families have in many places become the usual and common wages of the freedmen.

The effect of the statute in question will be, therefore, to compel the freedmen, under penalty of punishment as criminals, to accept and labor for the wages established by these combinations of employers.

It places them wholly in the power of their employers, and it is easy to foresee that, even where no such combination now exists, the temptation to form them offered by the statute will be too strong to be resisted, and that such inadequate wages will become the common and usual wages throughout the State.

The ultimate effect of the statute will be to reduce the freedmen to a condition of servitude worse than that from which they have been emancipated—a condition which will be slavery in all but its name.

It is therefore ordered that no magistrate, civil officer, or other person shall in any way or manner apply, or attempt to apply, the provisions of said statute to any colored person in this department.

By command of Major General A. H. TERRY:

E. W. SMITH,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

INJUSTICE OF GEORGIA.

When Georgia grudgingly permitted this class of citizens to be competent witnesses in court only in cases where persons of color were a party or the offense charged was against the person or property of a person of color; and when her statutes declared that all persons wandering or strolling about in idleness, who were able to work, and who had no property to support them; all persons having a fixed abode, who had no visible property to support them, should be deemed and considered vagrants, and upon conviction should be fined and imprisoned, or be bound out to some person for a time not longer than one year;

INJUSTICE OF MISSISSIPPI.

When Mississippi passed laws that semi-annually the sheriffs, justices of the peace, and all other civil officers of the country should report to probate courts all colored persons under eighteen years of age whose parents had not the means or refused to provide or support them, to the end that such persons might be apprenticed, preference being given to the former owner of such person, and power being granted to inflict corporeal chastisement; and if any colored person failed to pay his "freedmen's pauper-fund tax" it should be prima facie evidence of vagrancy, and be subject to such penalty; and that colored persons should have a home or employment by the second Monday of each January, and if living in city or country to have a license from the mayor or member of the board of police of his beat, authorizing him to do job-work; and if leaving his place of employment should be arrested and carried back to his employer, the captor being entitled to five dollars and ten cents per mile from place of arrest to place of delivery; and no colored person was allowed to rent or lease any lands or tenements except in incorporated towns or cities, in which places the corporate authorities should control the same;

INJUSTICE OF FLORIDA.

When Florida passed laws that no colored man should own or possess any gun or weapon of any kind; that his children should not be educated except by a licensed teacher, such license costing five dollars; when vending their little products to carry a certificate from some respectable person, certifying that such products were their own and had not been stolen—

When such laws as these, and many more of equal and worse hardship, were enacted by Southern States against this class of citizens, the power of the national Government went forth and leveled the false and unjust fabric of these States to the feet of the oppressed, and then called upon all citizens to rear a new civil and political structure, in which all the inhabitants should be equal in the blessings as well as the duties of government.

THIS BILL IMPOSES NO HARDSHIPS UPON ANY OTHER RACE OR CLASS OF CITIZENS.

This bill before the House imposes no hardships upon any class of people, or upon any interest or section. It asks only the removal of unlawful and unjust hardships with the same right that any free citizen may ask for the abatement of a nuisance, that the free air and sunshine of himself and family may not be poisoned; that any legal owner may ask for the restoratien of his property from the hands of the purloiner.

These hardships are as various as the incidents of every-day life, and I cannot better portray them than by quoting a portion of the address issued by the national colored convention held at New Orleans in 1872.

BILL OF GRIEVANCES.

Having been by solemn legislation of the American Congress raised to the dignity of citizenship, we appeal to law-abiding people of the States, and especially of those who in the days of the fugitive-slave law exhorted obedience to statutes however offensive, to protect and defend us in the enjoyment of our just rights and privileges upon all conveyances which are common carriers, at all resorts of public amusements, where tastes are cultivated and manhood is quickened, and in all places of public character, or corporate associations which owe their existence to the legislation of the nation or States; against the spirit of slavery which attempts to degrade our standard of intelligence and virtue by forcing our refined ladies and gentlemen into smoking-cars amid obscenity and vulgarity; which humiliates our pride by denying us first-class accommodations on steamboats, and compelling us to eat and sleep with servants, for which we are charged the same as those who have the best accommodations; and which closes the doors of hotels against famishing colored persons, however wealthy, intelligent, or respectable they may be, while all such public places and conveyances welcome and entertain all white persons, whatever may be their character, who may apply. Now, in view of this disgraceful inconsistency, this affectation or prejudice, this rebellion against the laws of God, humanity, and the nation, we appeal to the justice of the American people to protect us in our civil rights in public places and upon public conveyances, which are readily accorded, and very justly, to the most degraded specimens of our white fellow-citizens.

NO STATE CAN ABRIDGE THE PRIVILEGES OF CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The power of Congress is not reasonably questioned on the passage of this bill, and neither should the disposition or willingness of this Government in the performance of its duty; for a government that confers citizenship and exacts allegiance must complete its franchise and render protection to the humblest as well as to the most exalted. Section 1 of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

As a citizen of the United States I am entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; so are my constituents; and no State, neither Virginia, Georgia, Texas, nor any other, can make or enforce any law which shall abridge the civil and political rights and the common liberties of these citizens of the United States.

My constituents in Florida, according to the Constitution of the United States, are entitled to all privileges and immunities in Georgia, the same as citizens of that State themselves enjoy, provided they have acquired a legal residence therein in conformity with the requirement of the local law; and after such legal residence or citizenship is acquired, no jot or tittle of any privilege or immunity could be denied to them on account of color.

A citizen of the United States and a State is always equal to any other citizen of said State.

"COMMON DEFENSE AND GENERAL WELFARE OF THE UNITED STATES."

The indefinable reservoir of power, in the hands of the national Government, lies out of view, in its duty to provide for the "common defense and general welfare of the United States." This fountain is unfathomable, and will ever give forth according to each exigency. When it became necessary to "establish justice" by protecting the colored voters in the exercise of their right of suffrage against hostile State administrations, the power of Congress forged that effective remedy, the Enforcement Act.

When it became necessary to "insure domestic tranquility" by protecting loyal citizens in their life, liberty, and property, against murderous political conspiracies and hostile judiciaries, Congress found the power to pass that second great remedy, known as the Ku-Klux act.

To "promote the general welfare" Congress legislated against State banks of issue, and established a national system of paper currency; and for the promotion of the same general interests of the nation Congress may, in the exercise of its high legislative prerogative, settle the question of "cheap transportation" by regulating commerce among the States.

STATE-WRONGS AGAINST STATE-RIGHTS.

No ill can be stronger than the recuperative and repelling energy of the Government; and no selfishness, prejudice, or State wrongs, under the name of State rights, can be permitted to repress or weaken one vital principle of the Republic.

The franchise of citizenship must not be a mockery, but a full and perfect legal fruition.

PROGRESS AND CHARACTER OF THIS ENFRANCHISED CLASS OF CITIZENS.

The duties that go with it have been well performed by this enfranchised race; for where in this broad land is a more loyal and law-abiding people, and who serve their God and country with more alacrity than this new and patient class of citizens?

A better agricultural population for the production of southern staples cannot be found in the whole world; and the superstructure of society and commerce rests upon their broad shoulders as does the globe upon the shoulders of the mythological Atlantes.

They produce millions of wealth, yet themselves receive scarcely hundreds; and yet in the midst of adversity and hardship they make such noble progress in intelligence and thrift, that no other race, under like circumstances, can truthfully declare it would excel them.

In their ignorance they cherish political convictions that can be neither bought nor sold nor swayed by blandishments or danger; and I assert that the elective franchise is exercised with more purity among them than can be found in any northern city of more than twenty thousand inhabitants.

A people so loyal, peaceful, and laborious; whose past is only distinguished for the virtues of unrequited toil, obedience, and humility, earnest for prosperity, eager for knowledge and education for their rising generation—should they not receive all the encouragement that legislators and good men everywhere could give them, as but a slight atonement for their long oppression?

Oppression is no less severe in principle than in practice, and our forefathers created a revolution upon the principle alone that "taxation without representation is tyranny."

Is citizenship, which crowns the individual with only a refined injustice, any better? Injustice is always tyranny.

PROPHETS OF BAAL.

Pass this bill, and the tyranny of prejudice, violence, and error against this class of citizens will disappear like the miasma of night before the morning sun; and the practical inconveniences which gentlemen predict will be found to be far more in the fears of imagination than in actual experience.

All the unfriendly predictions volunteered upon this people have always come to naught in the past.

They entered into freedom with more sobriety than was predicted.

They continued in the even pursuits of industry, and kept up the usual production of cotton, and did not destroy themselves in riotousness and crime, as the unfriendly wiseacres so knowingly predicted.

They voted with more intelligence and safety than even their friends dared to hope; and everywhere these prophets of Baal proved how certainly they were never called to the work of prophecy. Society always adjusts itself much easier than croakers would have the world to believe.

CIVIL-RIGHTS LAW IN FLORIDA.

The State of Florida passed an act similar in every essential respect with this bill now under discussion; and for one year this act has been in practical force and observance; and I am gratified to state that the first case of its violation has yet to come to my knowledge. It has been a panacea for many of the ills in our State.

When kindness and common courtesy fail, the law intervenes, but this will be seldom necessary; for simply to represent the power of the law seems to supersede its enforcement.

While we need not, under the dominance of the present political party in Florida, this congressional legislation to secure our citizens in the full and exact enjoyment of all their legal rights and liberties, it is sadly needed in most of the States in the Union; and I am confident that even my unwilling democratic constituents at home will feel a pang of grim pleasure when they learn of the passage of this act; for they possess that same generous charitableness, in common with the rest of the human family, which is always anxious that their neighbors shall be blessed with the same happiness or misery as themselves.

CONSTITUTIONAL BREAD MUST NOT BE TRAMPLED UNDER FOOT BY THE SWINE OF PREJUDICE.

But to the republican party, controlling the action of this Congress, this class of our constituents appeal with outstretched hands for rescue from the maltreatment of corporate hate and intolerance.

They ask no new rights, no further endowments but they do ask and demand that their constitutional inheritance shall be given to them in full and not in moieties, and that no particle of their legal bread shall be wrested from them and their children only to be trampled under foot by the swine of prejudice.

Color is no crime, and the sacrilegious hands that would make it so, by condemning the Creator who is the author of it, must be stayed by just and firm legislation.

It was well remarked by Rousseau, that "It is precisely because the force of things tends always to destroy equality that the force of legislation should always tend to maintain it."

To republican members we appeal, whose first breath of life was the pure air of freedom, whose souls grew and matured surrounded by no mildewy technicalities in freedom, for the vindication of our cause, and for that equity in the laws and the Constitution which is the sacred birthright of every citizen.

One particle of dust in the human eye obstructs the free vision, and produces irritation affecting the health and comfort of the whole system.

Is the eye of liberty less sensitive in the body politic.

Then again we appeal to you—

> Who could not change with the changing hour.
> The self-same men in peril and in power;
> True to the law of right; as warmly
> Prone to grant another's as maintain their own;
> Foes of oppression wheresoe'er it be,
> To you, the proudly free.

Mr. STOWELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been so plainly manifest to the sense of justice of every right-thinking man that further legislation should be had to fully secure the rights of our colored citizens, that we have come to look upon it as an event likely to occur in the regular course of legislation, and are in danger of overlooking its importance and its bearings upon both the white and colored races. The discussion of yesterday shows us that slavery is not yet dead, but that it stalks about with its old barbarous tendencies; if not like the bully, at least like a ghost, insisting upon the perpetual degradation of the colored race.

Under the laws and institutions of our country, a colored man elected to this House has the same rights here that are accorded to any of us, and as a natural corollary he should have the same rights everywhere in our broad land.

He is given equal privileges in Congress now. Instead of being represented by proxy as three-fifths of a man, he now represents in his own person a whole man, and has an equal voice in the selection of his representative. Being equal here, why not everywhere, as the days of his inequality have passed away? In the highest legislative branches of the nation he is recognized as having equal rights, and so recognized by the democrats; but according to the theory of the democratic party, when you come to the church, or the hotel, or the railroad, or the school-house, or the jury-box, then there is and should be no practical recognition of his equality. By a consistent course of reasoning, those who oppose this bill would, I suppose, be in favor of giving the colored member a seat in some obscure corner in the cloak-room of this House; and would, like my colleague, [Mr. HARRIS,] address his remarks only to the white members. and, yielding to the white gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] for a question, would decline to yield to the colored man from South Carolina, [Mr. RANSIER.] Unreasonable, apparently, as his course seemed, yet his actions accorded with his enunciations; for both expressed opposition to the rights of the colored race, and were to that extent much more consistent than the course of some of the opposition members, who, with protestations of love and friendship for the colored race, never lose the opportunity of giving him a blow in his struggle for his rights.

This position is most forcibly illustrated by the course of the democratic Legislature of Virginia, which on yesterday adopted resolutions professing to cherish no "captious hostility to the present administration of the Federal Government," while it is a well-known fact that the very members of the Legislature who adopted this resolution were elected to their seats, just two months ago, because of their bitter hostility to the republican party and the "present administration of the Federal Government."

The second resolution says—

That this General Assembly recognize the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as a part of that instrument, and desire in good faith to abide by its provisions as expounded by the Supreme Court of the United States.

And the fourth resolution very inconsistently says—

That the bill now before Congress known as the civil-rights bill is in violation of this amendment as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, is an infringement on the constitutional and legislative powers of the States, is sectional in its operation, and injurious alike to the white and colored population of the Southern States, and that its enforced application in these States will prove destructive of their systems of education, arrest the enlightenment of the colored population, in whose improvement the people of Virginia feel a lively interest; produce continual irritation between the races, counteract the pacification and development now happily progressing, repel immigration, greatly augment emigration, reopen wounds now almost healed, engender new political asperities, and paralyze the power and influence of the State government for duly controlling and protecting domestic interests and preserving internal harmony.

In regard to these resolutions I have only to say that it looks very much as if the democratic Legislature of Virginia was willing to recognize the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States if Congress would only prevent it from being carried into execution; and they desire the whole question of the rights of the citizens of the United States to be left to the control and exclusive jurisdiction of the several State Legislatures, so that those Legislatures might practically defeat the benefits to be derived from it, by adverse legislation or by non-legislation. Their recognition of the fourteenth amendment is not friendly. It is the recognition which the hostile foe gives to the enemy it dare not cope with openly. They seek to damn it with faint praise.

The General Assembly of Virginia starts out with the proposition that the civil-rights bill under consideration is in violation of the fourteenth amendment, which they profess to recognize. I deny that. It simply carries into practical execution the provisions of that amendment; and those who are friendly to the fourteenth amendment must of necessity be in favor of the civil-rights bill, as the one is but the natural, logical, and legal sequence of the other. Its constitutionality is so obvious that I need not say anything more upon that point. After declaring the civil-rights bill unconstitutional the General Assembly of Virginia follow it up with a threat that if passed they will destroy the school system of Virginia and continue the political prosecutions and social ostracisms which have been so bitterly waged against all who have hitherto dared to advocate the rights of the colored man. These are no idle threats; they are meant by the conservatives of Virginia, and are openly announced on the streets of Richmond.

The position of the colored man in life has changed. They have ceased to be slaves, and are now citizens. In this transformation they have assumed new rights and new duties. We force the duties of citizenship upon them; it is but just to give them all the rights as well. For hundreds of years the colored race was kept in chains and slavery of the most revolting and degrading character. All generous impulses, all hope and ambition, were crushed out, and they were simply machines, subject to the will of the master, liable to be placed upon the auction-block, to be separated from wife, children, and friends, denied the opportunities of religion, and condemned like criminals if they sought knowledge or intellectual advancement. Under such influences it was impossible for them to improve either in material prosperity or in mental attainments.

But through the workings of an all-wise Providence and the disinterested patriotism and humanity of the republican party, their chains have been broken, slavery forever destroyed, the prerogatives of the master have dissolved, and the rights of the servant crystallized in the crucible of civil war. All the responsibilities of American citizenship now devolve upon them, responsibilities which commenced with that citizenship; the responsibility to labor and provide for themselves and their families, to clothe the body with raiment, and the mind with knowledge, and the heart with morality; the responsibility of contributing their share to support their country in its struggle for national supremacy, or, if needs be, of defending its honor against any foe. Can this be done cheerfully or successfully by them when they are made to feel in every walk of life and in every part of our country that the laws and customs and the habits and thoughts of the people with whom they live place the stamp of inferiority upon them; when, from their entrance into life to their departure to another world when the grave closes over them; whether in the school, in the church, in the place of public amusement seeking recreation or in the grave-yard taking their final rest, a moral mark of degradation follows them wherever they go? No! The Constitution and laws of our country say no! The spirit of our institutions say no! And the voice of our common humanity and the teachings of Christianity say no! That it is unfair, unmanly, and unchristian to compel these people, who have so long labored under the yoke who by their past lack of advantages are so little able to combat successfully in the great struggle of life, to bear the full responsibilities of American citizenship and deny them those equal civil rights which would enable them to meet those responsibilities successfully, which would give them that moral élan, that inward feeling of the heart which is so sustaining and encouraging, that feeling that they enjoy these great privileges as of right, that self-consciousness of equality before the law, which is as necessary for a successful contest after intellectual improvement as food and exercise are in the struggle for physical development.

The democratic party has persistently and brutally opposed every measure tending to ameliorate and advance the condition of the colored man, and he can only rely in the future, as in the past, upon the republican party to recognize his claims to justice. The democratic party in Congress, and in every State Legislature, opposed the adoption of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. They have opposed the execution of every law which tended toward carrying those amendments into effect. They denied as long as they could the right of the colored man to testify in our courts, and prevented him from voting at the polls. But now he testifies and votes, except in places where fraud, and intimidation and violence deprive him of his rights. We all know that hundreds of men have been murdered in the Southern States because they dared to exercise their rights against the wishes of the democracy.

But while they now by law enjoy the privilege of testifying and voting, yet they are still denied many rights to which they are entitled—to serve upon a jury, to have conveniences in traveling and at the hotels, and to send their children to school. In Virginia these rights are not denied by force, but by adverse legislation. Our State constitution provides that every voter shall be eligible as a juror; yet a democratic Legislature has for four years so perverted the spirit of that constitution that the colored man has been practically excluded from the jury-box. Our State constitution also provides for the education of all the children in the old Commonwealth, and yet a democratic Legislature has practically excluded them from this privilege. One of the leading citizens of Virginia, who is a member of the General Assembly, and who will probably represent the State for the next six years as one of her Senators in the United States Senate, said, in a speech in Richmond in 1869, when we were discussing the adoption of our present State constitution, that although the conservative party hated the constitution in all its features, they had better vote for it rather than oppose it, and thereby secure the election of democrats to the General Assembly; "For," said he, "I do not care what the constitution of the State is, if the people will only give the conservative party the control of the Legislature." By adverse legislation he proposed to defeat every obnoxious feature of that instrument.

It might recognize the right of the colored man to serve upon the jury; it might provide for the education of his children; he did not care what it was; because with a democratic or conservative legislature they could and would defeat every measure calculated to benefit the black race—and they have done it very effectually. Although our State constitution has been adopted for four years, yet ninety-nine out of every hundred colored men have never been summoned upon a jury. The report of the State superintendent of education for 1873, received by me this day, shows that Virginia has 445,893 illiterate persons ten years old and over, who cannot read and write. This is 50 per cent. It also shows that the public schools are kept open only five months of the year, and that during this short period only 15 per cent. of the colored population are in attendance upon the public schools.

Deplorable and alarming as this exhibit is, showing as it does such a hostility to the education of the poor and illiterate, yet threats are now openly made in the halls of legislation, by members of the General Assembly, who profess no hostility to the present administration, and say they will recognize the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution—threats are openly made that if the Congress of the United States dare to pass the civil-rights bill now under consideration they will close every public school in the State of Virginia, and a mild reflex of this threat was witnessed in this House yesterday in the speech of my colleague. And this same General Assembly has instructed its Senators and requested me, as one of its Representatives, to carry out those resolutions; but I spurn such a request, because it is against the wishes of a vast majority of the people of my district, and against the dictates of my own conscience. I have no hesitation in saying that the legal, political, and intellectual existence of the colored man is seriously threatened in Virginia, and that some immediate legislation by Congress is absolutely needed to rescue the poor, helpless, and uneducated colored man of Virginia from gradual, insidious political extinguishment. Their personal rights and their rights in property are at the mercy of their political enemies—not political opponents who simply differ in opinion and allow the same freedom that they claim for themselves—but political enemies, who believe in their political annihilation, and will not scruple to use every means in their power to tighten the screws and force them to an abandonment of their honest opinions.

Every colored man suing for his wages brings his case before a jury who are prejudiced against him because of his color. Every colored man tried as a criminal appears before a jury who are inclined to believe him guilty because of his race, and in both cases the fear of an adverse judgment may be held over him to force him to vote with that party which has been his constant and implacable foe. Such cases are by no means rare and their influence upon a poor friendless man recently a slave, and coming from the former master, can be readily imagined. The moral courage displayed by the colored man under these persecutions has been wonderful. They have lived in the constant faith that the republican party would give them exact justice and enable them to make a fair trial, free from persecutions, to become educated and prosperous citizens of our country.

This bill will enable them to make that trial. It takes away no right from any white citizen; it does no injury to any one; it does violence to no one's conscience, and it displaces no one in his position before his fellow-men. It simply gives an undeniable right to a citizen of the United States who is fully entitled to it.

The great objection made to this bill by its opponents is that it establishes social equality. But they make the mistake, which has been made for generations, of confounding what belongs to society with what belongs to personal rights.

There is no question of social equality in this bill. Gentlemen may choose their personal associates as they please; they may be white or black, or between the two; that is their choice, and no one proposes to interfere with it. This bill does not interfere with it, and I have yet to see the colored man who asks for it or desires it. They simply ask for equality under the law; that when any institution or privilege is created or regulated by law, it shall be free equally to all, without regard to race or color.

The hotel is a legal institution, originally established by common law and still subject to statutory regulations; railroads are legal institutions, chartered and vested with all their rights by legislative enactments; schools are legal institutions, established and maintained by law; the jury is a legal institution, existing here since the foundation of our Government, and is regarded as the palladium of our personal liberties; and what I now insist on, and what this bill provides, is that all these legal institutions shall be for the benefit of all alike.

You say the colored man has prejudices. If you wish to obliterate them, you can do so by kindness and generosity and an exhibition of a purpose to render justice. He is susceptible to kindness. He remembers that his labor raised you and your ancestors with all the surroundings of affluence, education, and refinement, while poverty, ignorance, and neglect were his lot. He feels that the sweat of his brow was coined into dollars which kept you in luxury, while a scanty pittance was doled out to him in his little hut; and he has an instinctive feeling that as his muscle was the productive source of income, a fair proportion was not devoted to his comfort and improvement; and he has a further feeling that your denial of equal civil rights at present is not only a denial to recognize and compensate him for his services in the past, but is also an indication that you desire to continue the policy of the past, so far as its practical benefits are concerned, into the future.

If you desire to conquer the prejudices of the past, or better still, if you wish to make some compensation for old benefits, you can do it best by securing bright prospects for his future. If you wish to restore harmony in feeling and unite in efforts to build up the material prosperity of the South, you can do it best by the gentler influences of confidence and justice. His friendship cannot be secured by keeping alive unpleasant memories and by continued indignities constantly remind him of his former degradation. But remove all trace of his past trials and associations, and then feelings will spring up to remove all doubts and brighten his future. Let us rise to a just sense of our duty and responsibility, achieve a victory over our prejudices and resentments, give up all hope of obtaining undue and unlawful advantages for the future, rise to the dignity and honor of our professions, forget ourselves, sink our differences in the respect we bear our fellow-beings, who are equal in all the elements of true citizenship, to ourselves. Suffer not the fleeting and unworthy influences of caste to outweigh our love for human rights, the immunities of the citizen, and the demands of the nation; but in view of the sufferings and humiliations of the past, let us rise to the true character of our position, and give to this long-suffering people full equality.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will yield for a few moments to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WHITEHEAD.]

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desired and intended to speak on this bill, but am now satisfied that I will not have an opportunity to do so. However, inasmuch as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] who has just taken his seat has attacked the Legislature and governor of that State, on account of the joint resolution which has been submitted to Congress, I ask to have read by the Clerk, in reply, what I have marked of an editorial on public schools, published in the Richmond State Journal, the organ of the republican party of Virginia. It is edited by two northern gentlemen, who are both educated and able, and is, in my opinion, the ablest republican journal south of the Potomac. The extract deserves attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

The public schools of Richmond are among the best to be found anywhere, and the time is soon coming when, if not tampered with by the meddling interference of outside legislation, they will be sought in preference to any other for the instruction of our youth of all classes, ranks, and conditions. We can imagine how their usefulness would be entirely destroyed, and the money now expended upon them be worse than thrown away, by legislating them into practical machines for the use of demagogues a thousand miles beyond our own borders. Here is the danger to the whole system of popular education in the South, and the sooner our members of Congress learn to attend to their legitimate duties under the Constitution, and let the domestic matters of the States alone, the sooner will the South and the whole country come up to the standard of educational advancement desired of them. The people of Virginia have made no distinction in the quality and quantity of education imparted to the white children of the State over its colored children. And especially is this true of our city schools under the superintendence of Mr. Binford. We think that, if the visiting committee showed any preference in their attention to the schools yesterday, it was manifested in those of the colored children, where their stay was relatively longer, and greater commendation was bestowed.

The colored people of this city ought to petition Messrs. SUMNER and BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to keep their meddling hands off the public-school system under which so many thousands of the brighter-faced children of their race are now being gratuitously educated. If they do not do this, but encourage such unconstitutional interference as is now sought, they will wake up one of these mornings to find the doors of every public-school house in the State barred to all educational advantages for their own and white children alike.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. That, Mr. Speaker, is the opinion of the republican party of the State of Virginia.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, it is a palpable misnomer to designate the bill under consideration as "a bill to protect all persons in their civil and legal rights." It is a sham—a transparent deception—so to characterize it. A more appropriate title would be, "A bill to create social equality in the late slave-holding States, to consolidate the two races in hostility to each other, and to destroy the public schools." Whatever may be the apparent and ostensible purpose of the advocates of this legislation, its real objects cannot be mistaken. It professes to apply to all persons, native and foreign, European and Asiatic, black and white; but this thin disguise is thrown off when it forbids any distinction to be made as to admission or accommodation in public inns, places of public amusement, in public carriages of passengers, or in public schools, "of any citizen of the United States, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It is no part of the object of the provisions of this bill to protect all persons in their rights, whether civil or social. It has exclusive application to the colored race, as if that race alone required the protecting arm of the national Government to shield it from injustice and wrong. There are "persons," and not a few of them, in the United States who are not citizens of the United States, and whose rights are not protected by this bill of sham pretensions. There are not only large numbers of such persons now here, but they are flocking and crowding to our shores by every steamer that enters our ports. The foreign-born population of the State represented in part on this floor by the distinguished gentleman [Mr. BUTLER] who has charge of this bill amounted in 1870 to three hundred and fifty-three thousand—nearly one-fourth of the entire population.

In Wisconsin and in Minnesota they constitute considerably more than one-half of the population, and in my own State they number two hundred and twenty thousand out of the million and three-quarters. What proportion of the large mass of foreign-born population within the jurisdiction of the United States is unnaturalized, or having taken the initiatory steps of citizenship have not become full-fledged citizens of the United States, I shall not stop to inquire. Whatever their numbers, or wherever they are, they are not protected in their rights by this bill. State laws may guarantee to them the right of suffrage, or the right to hold property, and to transmit it by will or devise, or even to hold office; but the ægis of American citizenship is denied to them by the negro amendments to the Constitution, as well as by all the legislation of Congress to enforce those amendments. Why this discrimination against race? Why should the legislation of Congress brand with inferiority the industrious, frugal, and law-abiding German, or the impulsive and quick-witted Irishman, after he has declared his intention to cast his lot with our people, and has abjured his allegiance to his native land? Is it because the negro has demonstrated his superior capacity for self-government; or that he is more loyal to the institutions of the country and better fitted to discharge the high duties of American citizenship? Let the condition of South Carolina and Louisiana answer for the colored man; and let Wisconsin and Minnesota answer for the foreigner—naturalized and unnaturalized.

But what rights of the sons of Africa are now unprotected, or need enforcement? In which of the late slave States, or elsewhere, are they not equal before the law with the white man? What State is enforcing any law which "abridges their privileges and immunities" as citizens of the United States, or is denying to them the "equal protection of the laws?" Emancipated from servitude by the thirteenth amendment, elevated to the rights of full citizenship, and to the equal protection of law by the fourteenth amendment, and made a voter and a sovereign by the fifteenth amendment, and these amendments enforced by sundry acts of Congress, he is to-day in the full and complete enjoyment of every civil right possessed by his late master. There is no office in the gift of the nation that he may not fill. He can vote and be voted for. He can buy, sell, lease, convey, and devise all descriptions of property. He can go where he listeth, and come when he pleases. He can drink at the fountains of knowledge without money and without price. Schools are provided for his children at the public expense, and he can worship his Maker after the dictates of his own conscience. He can marry, and be divorced as other people. He can idle or work, sleep or feed, play the monkey or the man, as his inclinations direct. He can sicken and die, and be buried at the public expense. If this be not the largest liberty, what is it? If he is not the equal of any other man before the law, in what does his inequality consist? If there are any other "immunities or privileges" of American citizenship that this pet of Massachusetts does not enjoy in all their abundant fullness, let them be enumerated. And yet it is to be inferred from the provisions of this bill that there are certain civil rights to which the negro is entitled which some or all of the States have abridged, or which they have failed to enforce. It would seem that there are "public inns" where he cannot obtain bed or board; that he is excluded from places of public amusement; that stage-coaches, railroads, and steamboats will not transport his odoriferous person, or his baggage from place to place; that the public schools are closed to his children, and when death overtakes him, decent burial is not accorded to his lifeless corpse.

Will it be said that any "immunity or privilege" of the African citizen is abridged, or that he is denied "the equal protection of the laws," when he is required to ride in a railroad car set apart for his special accommodation? If he were refused passage altogether there might be some pretense for such legislation. The same remark will apply to theaters and other public places of amusement. So long as they are open to them, and they are not absolutely excluded, it cannot be said that they are abridged of any right or denied "the equal protection of the laws." It is inconceivable that the provisions of the fourteenth amendment should have any application to the pretended rights provided for by this bill. The "equal protection of the laws" could not have been designed for any such case. It could never have been contemplated that every citizen, male and female, black and white, foreign and native, should be accorded the enjoyment of every right in the same measure and in the same degree. Such a construction would invalidate all legislation which separated the sexes in schools supported by public funds, or which in any measure or degree discriminates in favor or against any portion or class of the community. If this be the true construction of the Constitution, all separations of the sexes in schools, churches, or elsewhere, either by law or the regulations of society, in the North as well as in the South, are violations of it, as the citizen has no sex. It is not only a strained, latitudinous, and unreasonable construction of the fourteenth amendment, upon which to base the provisions of this bill, but it is wholly impracticable, and in many of its provisions impossible of execution and enforcement. It is such an interference with the rights of private property and the rules and regulations of society that no free people would tolerate such mischievous intermeddling. No parallel or counterpart of such legislation can be found outside of the most despotic governments and of the most absolute tyranny.

But, Mr. Speaker, I take higher ground on this question. I do not base my objections to this bill on its inexpediency or its impolicy merely. That were enough; but there are graver objections to it than these. They go to the power of Congress to enact it. I maintain that Congress has no constitutional authority to take jurisdiction over this subject, and thus oust the jurisdiction of the several States. It will not be claimed that prior to the adoption of the three negro amendments, (thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth,) the Federal Government ever exercised any legislative authority or control over the question of civil rights. With the exception of the restrictions imposed by the Constitution upon the States, such as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and a few others, the whole domain of the individual rights of the citizen depended upon the several Sate governments for their existence, protection, and enforcement. It was to establish and secure these civil rights, including the right to acquire and possess property and to seek happiness and personal safety, that the State governments were erected; and the Federal Government never assumed any authority or jurisdiction over them. Has the central Government, by these amendments or by any of them, been vested with this enlarged jurisdiction? Are the civil rights of the people of all the States in the keeping of Congress, and have we the power to limit and restrain the exercise of legislative power by the several States on all questions affecting the rights of citizens? These are grave and important questions; for they involve the very frame-work of our complex system of government; they involve the very existence of the States for the purpose of home and local self-government, including the regulation of civil rights and the rights of person and property. More than that, they bring up for solution the right of self-government itself. For it cannot be gainsaid or denied, that if the men of Maine or California can legislate for the people of Missouri or Carolina on subjects local in their nature and exclusively affecting their own individual and home affairs and personal rights, this Government is at once transformed from a democratic republic into an oligarchy, and that the basis of our political fabric—the right of the people to self-government—is undermined and destroyed. If such is the effect of these amendments, we are no longer citizens, but subjects of a power foreign to us, and over which we have no control. Fortunately for the rights of the States and of the people, no such inference can be deduced from them, and no such power is vested in the Federal Government. This opinion as to the effect and meaning of these three amendments is amply confirmed and ably vindicated by the the late adjudication of the Supreme Court in the case already referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] (Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace, pages 57–83.) And if this House shall, in the face of this exhaustive and conclusive opinion of a republican court enact this bill into a law, the country may well conclude that its action has been instigated by other than patriotic motives, and prompted by mere partisan considerations or by an insane greed for the retention of sectional political power.

The thirteenth amendment gave freedom to the slave; by the first section of the fourteenth his freedom was guaranteed and established, and citizenship, both of the United States and of the State, defined; while the fifteenth amendment elevated the late slave to the privileges of a voter and a sovereign. To each of these amendments was appended a section giving power to Congress to enforce them by "appropriate legislation;" an act of superfluity, inasmuch as Congress, under the Constitution, had power to make all laws "necessary and proper" for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof, except that the word "appropriate" was substituted for the words "necessary and proper," in the interest of centralism and loose construction. These appended sections gave Congress no power that it had not without them. Authority for the legislation contained in this civil-rights bill cannot fairly be deduced from any of these amendments, unless it be from the first section of the fourteenth. This section reads thus:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The first paragraph merely declares who are citizens of the United States and what constitutes citizenship of the State. A citizen of a State must have been born in the United States or naturalized, and be a resident of the State; while to constitute a citizen of the United States, he need only be born or naturalized in the United States. It can hardly be conceived that this declaration or definition, as to the once much-mooted question of citizenship, has conferred upon Congress power to legislate upon the rights of citizens in the States, and to divest and nullify the jurisdiction of each State over its own citizens. Nor is it believed that such legislation is claimed by its advocates to be deducible from this first paragraph of the first section of the fourteenth amendment. If Congress has any power over the subject, it must be derived from the subsequent clauses of this section, by which the States are inhibited from abridging the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States and from denying the equal protection of its laws to any person within its jurisdiction. Assuming that by virtue of these clauses (which I am not prepared to concede) that Congress has power to legislate to protect the rights prohibited from invasion or infringement by the States, there can be no question but that the "immunities and privileges of citizens of the United States" are immunities and privileges that appertain to citizens of the Union as such, and have no reference to the civil rights of the citizen of the State. They are such privileges and immunities as belong to the citizen of the United States by virtue of the existence of the Federal Union, its national character, and its Constitution and laws. The fact that in this prohibition against State legislation citizens of the United States are mentioned, and not citizens of the State, when they are both mentioned and defined in the previous section, shows conclusively that the prohibition was not designed to extend to the rights and privileges of the latter. So that the conclusion seems to be inevitable, that the second clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment does not give Congress any power to interfere in the regulation or control of those rights of the citizens of the State which have from the foundation of the Government been exclusively within the domain of State legislation.

Can the clause forbidding the denial by any State to any person within its jurisdiction of equal protection under its laws be construed to authorize the legislation proposed in this bill or any other legislation affecting the civil rights of its citizens, in the absence of any law of the State making discriminations against the negro as a class? There is no evidence before this House of the enactment of any law which fails to give the negro like protection with the white man, and before Congress shall commit itself to any interference with the duties of State governments on this subject, much less to the provisions of this mischievous bill, it should be satisfied that the States have disregarded this prohibition, and equal protection is denied the negro by law. On this point I quote from the opinion of Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case in 16 Wallace, page 81:

> In the light of the history of these amendments and the pervading purpose of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negro resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden. * * *. We doubt very much whether any action of a State, not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision.

Further on, after speaking of the sentiment in favor of a strong government growing out of the late civil war, the same learned judge says:

> But however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States, with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights, the rights of person and of property, was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States and to confer additional power on that of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am not one of that political faith who hold that the opinion of the highest judicial tribunal, on a question of constitutional law, binds and concludes either of the other departments of the Government. They are co-ordinate and co-equal with the Supreme Court, and in its own sphere each must determine for itself to what extent the supreme law controls its opinions and its action. But as an authoritative exposition of the Constitution the opinion of the Supreme Court is always deserving of the most respectful consideration and the most thoughtful deference, not only from the people at large, but from their agents in the other departments of the Government. Twice were the questions involved in these cases argued and reargued; and coming as this opinion does from members of the same political household with the majority of this body, it merits at their hands an honest, impartial, and well-considered judgment. It is humbly submitted, that under the principles enunciated in the opinion from which I have read the Supreme Court must hold that the provisions of this bill, if enacted into law, are unconstitutional and of no effect. And if this should be otherwise, why fan the embers of sectional hate into new life? Why give your sanction to a measure that will inevitably increase the enmity of the two races, already in some sections sufficiently exasperated, and that must fail of benefit to the negro, and in all likelihood be of incalculable injury to him? For nearly a decade you have been legislating for the negro by amendments to the Constitution and by acts of Congress; the judicial power of the Government has been placed at his service; the Army and Navy have done police duty for him; Senate and House have been wrangling over him for years. He sits as a legislator in both ends of the Capitol. His pathway to wealth, position, and place have been cleared of all obstructions. He is king of South Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, and to-day he holds in the hollow of his rough hand the destiny of this grand Republic. And all this you have done for him. Is it not enough? and may you not appropriate the interrogatory of the prophet, and ask yourself in tones of heartfelt lamentation, "What more could I have done for my people than I have done?" Let the negro and his rights be dismissed these halls forever; and let him work out his political salvation, if not with fear and trembling, at least without any further sacrifice of the great interests of the country.

I find it difficult to comprehend how the negro is to be benefited by the passage of this bill. Nor can I understand why there should be such discrimination in his favor as between him and the white citizen. Justice is administered to him without sale, denial, or delay, and there is no legal wrong that he may sustain for which he cannot obtain like redress in the courts of the State with the white man. If a white citizen is excluded from a public inn or a place of public amusement he must sue in the State courts, and content himself with the actual damages sustained; but if it be a colored man who has a similar cause of action, the unfortunate inn-keeper, showman, or teacher of a public school is subjected to a penalty of from one hundred to five thousand dollars, and in addition the man "guilty of a skin" has his cause of action for damages, and both the actions must be instituted in the United States courts. Nor do I see the propriety of his being forced into the public schools against the wishes or prejudices, if you please, of those by whom they are supported, when nothing can be more certain than that success will tend to the destruction of the system, and thus leave his children without any means of education. So odious and distasteful is that feature in this bill, opening the schools to the negro, that the republican candidate for governor at the late election in Virginia, and who has just been appointed to the judgeship of the eastern district by President Grant, most unequivocally condemned their admission in the public schools of that State, and every republican speaker in the canvass took the same position.

And in confirmation of this sentiment among republicans in the South, I read an extract from one of the leading republican journals of Virginia, the Lynchburgh Press:

> As the schools are at present organized, perfect impartiality is shown; equally competent teachers are employed for white and colored schools; and while the whites, in giving in adherence to mixed schools, would have to violate in many cases the preconceived ideas that have been instilled into their minds from their birth, the colored people, on the other hand, (and we speak of those of them who are worthy of the most consideration, and not the professional politicians,) are loth to bring their children into competition with their pale-faced neighbors—as they would in mixed schools—because they fear that the impartiality that now exists would under such circumstances fail to obtain; and they know further, that while the common-school system, as now conducted, is productive of peace and harmony between the races, the innovation that Mr. Sumner and other theorists and impracticables seek to environ us with could not in the nature of things be otherwise than prolific of discord, tumult, and open rupture.
> We are now, and ever have been, the unflinching advocates of free schools even when such views were unpopular, and in opposing this feature of the bill of Mr. Sumner we are influenced solely by a desire to perpetuate a system that is fraught with much of good to both races · and we do not, therefore, feel like quietly sitting down and folding our hands and withholding condemnation from a measure which, although originating with a whilom republican, cannot fail to be attended with the most disastrous consequences to the cause of public education.
> We are thoroughly convinced that if this feature remains in the bill, and Congress is possessed of the temerity to pass it, the death-knell of public schools will have been sounded, not only in Virginia but in other of the Southern and some of the Western States. In this State the provision of the Constitution originating them will be rescinded, and the colored children will be the worst sufferers by so unfortunate an event, because much the larger portion of the taxes levied for educational purposes are imposed on the whites, and it is not within the range of probability that a democratic Legislature will tax the people to propagate mixed schools.

But, strange to say, the medicine which Virginia republicans refuse to administer for themselves, Massachusetts republicans insist shall be crammed down their reluctant throats, while they, happy souls, are neither in a condition to require the nostrum or to suffer from its good or ill effects. Be assured, Mr. Speaker, that "there is a nigger under this wood-pile," and notwithstanding the fair exterior and comely outside of this bill for the protection of the civil rights of all persons, it has other purposes and objects than appear on its face. The scepter is departing from Israel; the star of empire is taking its way westward. Political power is stealing from the East to the great valley, and of late there has been a terrible shaking of the dry bones in that wonderful valley. The people have been sleeping and slumbering for, lo! these many years, and while they slept and slumbered they have been robbed and plundered by those of their own household. And they too are clamoring for protection; not for the rights of the negro, but for the rights of their own unrequited labor. They demand protection against the unjust discriminations of railroad monopolies; protection against the discrimination in favor of the bondholder against the plowholder; protection against the extortions of that "sum of all financial villainies," the national-banking system; in fine, protection against all forms of monopoly, whether of land or money, iron or salt, and all forms of legislation whereby the many are plundered for the benefit of the few, and the capital of the country enriched at the expense of its labor. Let no one mistake the signs of the times; let no one be deluded with the idea that the great uprising of the farmers of the West and the Northwest is to be satisfied with cheap transportation from the valley to the sea-board, or to the Gulf. It has a far greater significance. It means cheap transportation and cheap iron as well; it means cheap salt, cheap woolens, cheap cottons, cheap hats, cheap shoes, cheap money; it means the right to the rewards of their own labor, and the right to buy in the cheapest markets and to sell in the highest. No one comprehends more clearly the deep significance of this movement than the worshipers of mammon in the East—its money-changers and its lords of the furnace and the loom. And if by such measures as this civil-rights bill they can succeed in hoodwinking and cajoling the West into the continued worship and adoration of the ebony idol, and divert its attention from the real wrongs of the white man to the fancied and imaginary ones of the negro, and at the same time compact into one solid mass the negro population of the South and keep it under the command and control of the heirs and legal representatives of the Freedmen's Bureau, these vampires of the life-blood of the labor of the country may continue their ruinous depletion for many long and dreary years in the future. Such, I greatly mistrust, is the object and purpose of the bill under consideration.

It is difficult to conceive of anything more ill-timed and inopportune than the presentation of this measure for the adoption of Congress. There were reasons for indulging the hope that this Congress would devote its attention with zeal and alacrity to the discussion and maturing some measures for the relief of the country, and for rescuing its material interests from the stagnation and depression that now burden all branches of business. Everywhere, and in all sections of the Union, there is financial distress. Trade is stagnant and industry is paralyzed. Failure, disastrous failure of the financial policy of the Government is proclaimed by men of all parties and of all shades of opinion. The Treasury itself is on the verge of bankruptcy, and increased taxation is demanded by its head to meet its daily expenditures. Taxes, external and internal, are falling off; property of all kinds is shrinking in value; and honest labor goes unrequited and unrewarded. The shop and the manufactory are closed, and the mechanic seeks employment in vain. The wares of the merchant and the trader lie upon their shelves unsold, and they enter upon the business of the new year anxiously endeavoring to peer through the thick darkness that surrounds them.

The accumulations of a life-time disappear like snow before a summer's sun, and the millionaire of to-day is the bankrupt of the morrow. In all the great centers of population the working classes are giving unmistakable manifestations of discontent and dissatisfaction, muttering angry threats and imperiling the peace of society and the security of property—while throughout the teeming valley of the Mississippi the cultivators of its soil, with barns and granaries filled to overflowing and larders stocked with superabundance, are organizing secretly and openly against the authors of their misfortunes and against the obstacles to their prosperity. Seldom in the history of this country has there been witnessed such widespread disaster and such universal unrest and discontent. Fortunate, thrice fortunate, shall we be if, before the return of genial spring, we do not chronicle scenes in the streets of the large cities of the Union such as are only paralleled on the eastern continent in times of anarchy and revolution or when gaunt famine cursed the land. And yet amidst this financial crash, this national disorder and individual distress, and with all this wreck and ruin seen and felt everywhere, the chosen representatives of this suffering people are here gravely discussing whether the negro shall ride in the front or the rear car of a railroad or sit in the box or the pit of a theater. Surely we are stricken with judicial blindness.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ARCHER. It is understood that we reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. Points of order will be reserved.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the bill be made the special order on Thursday next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. SENER. Is not that time fixed for the education bill?

The SPEAKER. That is in the morning hour, and this special order is proposed to come in after the morning hour.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman propose to fix Thursday of this week?

The SPEAKER. Yes; day after to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman cannot expect to dispose of it this week.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. We want time to consider the bill. I object to so early a day being set.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The only changes made in the bill are in the way of reductions, which I believe the House will assent to very readily. We have not interfered with the province of the Naval Committee by changing the law at all; and I hope that before the end of this week we will get the bill out of the way.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Does this require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; a majority vote decides.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Then I will insist on a vote. If the gentleman's motion is agreed to we have only twenty-four hours in which to examine and consider this important bill.

Mr. MYERS. I suggest that the consideration of the bill be assigned for Wednesday of next week.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I desire to have it understood that, when the order is called, if the House should then consider any subject-matter to be of more importance, not only will it not be called upon to proceed with this bill, but I shall not attempt to urge it. This, however, is a bill which involves the first stroke of the committee in cutting down expenditures; and if I find the House ready to proceed with this matter of the naval appropriation bill on Thursday morning after the morning hour, I want to call it up and proceed with it; and I hope the House will sustain me in that motion, for I know the country will sustain us.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Has the report of the Secretary of the Navy been printed and laid on our desks? I have not seen it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I presume it has been printed and distributed. I have seen it, and had it in my possession for some time.

Mr. BECK. I have not seen it. I desire also to ask the gentleman whether his bill is printed?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I propose to have the bill ordered now to be printed.

Mr. BECK. And this is Tuesday evening, and the gentleman proposes to have the bill considered on Thursday.

Mr. MYERS. As so little time will be left for an examination of the bill if the order proposed be made, I move that Wednesday of next week be fixed for its consideration.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will not prevail, for the reasons I have stated. I think we cannot do better than proceed in the direction in which the Committee on Appropriations is faithfully laboring—that is, in putting the knife into the expenditures and cutting them down. A postponement of this measure now will be looked upon by the country, I am afraid, as in the direction of putting off the cutting down of expenses.

Mr MYERS. I am afraid of nothing in insisting upon the proper examination of the questions presented to us. What we desire is to have a full examination of the whole subject and pass upon it understandingly. We cannot do that without having the proper documents before us, and the time which the gentleman from Maine proposes to leave is too brief, in my judgment. I therefore press my motion that Wednesday of next week be fixed for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say this, that if we work this thing through without having the report of the Secretary of the Navy and without having seen the printed bill, while this may be making a pretense of economy, the result will probably be, that before the bill leaves the conference committee and becomes law the appropriations will be much higher than they would otherwise be.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to make a single observation?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think the House will proceed under a misapprehension, if it supposes that passing this bill on one day or on another is to lessen our expenditure before the year commencing on the 1st of July, 1874, and ending 30th June, 1875. It will not cut down the expenditure, it will not raise the expenditure, it will not interfere with the expenditure at all until next July.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But it will be what, if possible, is more important than that; it will be an indication that Congress not only talks economy and the reduction of expenditures but means it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care what anybody says about me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Well, let me say again, that if the House is not ready on Thursday to proceed, and has not sufficiently by that time examined this bill which does reduce the expenditure to the amount of millions, then I, as having charge of the bill, shall not and ought not to insist upon pressing it. But now that the question has been raised, I ask the House to adopt the motion I have made that the consideration of the bill be set for an early day.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does the gentleman from Maine propose to allow general debate on the bill?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I propose that there shall be as much time for general debate on the bill as the House wishes to take. If the House insists on time for general debate I shall not attempt to contravene its will. For myself I do not propose to speak at any great length.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It seems to me that if the consideration of the bill is set at the time the gentleman proposes, the general debate on the bill could be continued from day to day.

The SPEAKER. It can only be general debate until the House otherwise orders.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the House will sustain the motion of the gentleman from Maine; because, when the gentleman moves to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill, the majority of the House, if not ready to proceed, can postpone the order from day to day until they are ready. The matter is entirely under the control of the majority of the House in spite of the order for the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole on a certain day.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Allow me to state another reason why we selected an early day for the consideration of this bill. The Army appropriation bill has been set for Tuesday of next week, and if we can take up this bill and consider and pass it, it will be good work for this week.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a suggestion to gentlemen in regard to the question of time. It is very true that the cutting down of appropriations in any one of the annual appropriation bills, where no change in the law is made, will not take effect until the first of July next; but every gentleman knows that it is the almost unbroken habit of Congress to push off the appropriation bills until the last week of the session, and we then find ourselves with four or five large appropriation bills on our hands on the last night of the session. This happens sometimes because committees are not ready, but more frequently because a combination of interests pushes aside the appropriation bills, saying that they can always be passed.

Mr. MYERS. We are not near the last day of the session yet.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will allow the Committee on Appropriations to begin their work as soon as they are fairly ready and are able to present carefully prepared bills, so that they may be calmly considered. Every possible opportunity for reasonable debate the House has in its own hands by a majority vote. I hope the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will prevail, and if for any reason the time ought to be extended, the House will always have it in its power to extend it.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to postpone the consideration of this bill a single moment longer than is necessary to enable the House to know what it contains; to read the report of the Secretary of the Navy and the printed bill, and to examine both. We all know, those of us who have been here any time, that after a bill of this description once passes the House, we never give it any full consideration. The bill goes to the Senate and amendments of all sorts are put upon it, properly perhaps, but when those amendments come back, the Committee on Appropriations move a non-concurrence, and without any examination of the amendments the bill is sent to a committee of conference. That committee do just as they please, and when they present their report to the House they call the previous question without its being printed at all, or if printed, merely by numbers, so that no member knows what he is voting for, and must either vote for the report as a whole or against it. Hence the importance of fully considering such bills in the first instance. I was glad to hear the chairman of Committee on Appropriations make the remark he did. Heretofore the appropriation bills have been left to the last moment and crowded through with all sorts of improper legislation in them, because the House could not examine or understand them. I hope this House will agree not to fix a time for adjournment until every appropriation bill is passed, so that ten days shall intervene between the passage of the last of them and the adjournment. It is not for delay but to save time that I resist a too-hasty consideration of this bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now call the previous question on my motion.

Mr. MYERS. I rise to a point of order. I believe that before the previous question was called I moved an amendment, to make this bill the special order for Wednesday of next week.

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking the gentleman who reported the bill and made the motion in regard to it is entitled to call the previous question.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have not yielded for any amendment.

The SPEAKER. This debate has been merely interlocutory. There has been no recognition of members to entitle them to make motions.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me a moment before he moves the previous question?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is too late, and this debate has already run too far.

Mr. NEGLEY. I must insist on my motion to adjourn, if gentlemen are going to debate this matter all the evening.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I do not propose to debate, but I insist on the previous question.

Mr. MYERS. I give notice that if the previous question shall be voted down, I will offer the amendment I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The question will be put directly on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I thought the first question was upon seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Neither question being debatable, the result is precisely the same.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. HALE, of Maine; and on a division there were—ayes 105, noes 79.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOSTON POST-OFFICE.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a report from the sub-committee in regard to the proposed extension of the Boston post-office building; which report, with accompanying papers, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MYERS asked, and obtained, unanimous consent to have withdrawn from the files of the House the papers in the cases of Marcus Radish and John Hatfield.

Mr. SWANN asked, and obtained, unanimous consent to have withdrawn from the files of the House the memorial of Thomas Winans and William Winans, praying for an extension of their patent for the "cigar steamship," and the papers accompanying the same.

Mr. NEGLEY moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore on taking the chair said: The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, and the Senate on the first day of its present session having passed a standing order that twelve o'clock each day should be the hour for the assembling of the Senate, unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the Chair, seeing a quorum of Senators in their seats, calls the Senate to order; and the Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present the protest of Francis E. Abbott, of Toledo, Ohio, and 35,179 others, against what is called "the proposed theological amendment to the Constitution of the United States." I am informed that the total length of this protest is nine hundred and fifty-three feet, and that all the names were obtained through the Index, a publication of Toledo, Ohio. The protest is brief:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the great guarantees of religious liberty now contained in the Constitution of the United States, and to dismiss all petitions asking you to adopt measures for amending said Constitution by incorporating in it a "recognition of God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, and of the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler among the nations, and His revealed will as the supreme authority." We protest against such proposed amendment as an attempt to revolutionize the Government of the United States, and to overthrow the great principles of complete religious liberty and the complete separation of church and state on which it was established by its original founders.

I received this petition some time last spring, when it was too late for me to present it to the Senate; indeed, my health did not allow me to take part in public affairs at the time. As the question of constitutional amendment is always or nearly always submitted to the Judiciary Committee, I ask that this petition be referred to that committee.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the question of constitutional amendments by the action of the Senate at the last session was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I think that after the adoption of the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] instructing that committee to make certain inquiries, all other propositions—and there were several—in relation to amendments to the Constitution were sent to the same committee. I have certainly no objection to this going to the Judiciary Committee; but if the Committee on Privileges and Elections has the matter under consideration, and if all propositions to amend the Constitution have been sent to that committee up to this time, possibly it might be as well for it to take charge of the whole subject. I make this merely as a suggestion.

Mr. SUMNER. My impression is that only a special class of questions has been referred to the committee of which my friend the Senator from Indiana is chairman. He can inform the Senate how that is.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know what this refers to; I was not listening this morning when the Senator from Massachusetts spoke; but all propositions for amending the Constitution offered at the beginning of the session were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, including two proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. This is a petition most numerously signed, and largely from the West, against what is known as the proposed theological amendment to the Constitution of the United States by the insertion of new words in the preamble.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know what may be the object of the Senator in proposing to send this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary. I certainly have no objection to that reference if he wishes to send it there.

Mr. SUMNER. I simply wish to follow the usage of the Senate. I know that in times past all questions of constitutional amendment have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I thought it quite probable that this very question was now pending before that committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I think not now; but it has been at a former session, and reported upon by that committee. In the suggestion I have made I do not wish to be understood as having any objection whatever to this petition being sent to the Judiciary Committee; but if the Senate has resolved that all subjects of constitutional amendment should be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, this should go in the same way. It is very true, perhaps, that only questions which relate to elections, or amendments to the Constitution relative to elections, have gone to that committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I had that distinction in view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless some other motion be made the paper will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENSON. I present a petition from Siloam Lodge, No. 108, Independent Order of Good Templars, of Salem, Massachusetts, asking the prohibition by law in the Territories and other places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, of the manufacture of strong drinks. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a petition of certain citizens of California who are officers of the California Woman Suffrage Association. They petition for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and that it be submitted to the States for approval, which shall provide that the right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. They also petition that no State shall hereafter be admitted into the Union whose organic law shall make, or which shall permit the Legislature organized under its provisions to make, any distinction among its citizens, in their personal property or political rights, on account of sex. They further petition that the laws of the District of Columbia and the other Federal Territories shall be so changed, altered, and amended, first, that woman shall have the same right to vote and hold office as is now possessed and exercised by man; second, that woman shall, after marriage, have the same rights and powers to contract, and the same absolute ownership and dominion over her own property as before marriage, so that the wife shall be, in respect to her natural and property rights, the equal to her husband; third, that the common property of the husband and wife shall succeed to the wife, as it now does to the husband on the death of the wife, with the right to manage, transfer, and convey the same, and that the right of guardianship of her minor children be secured to her.

As this petition proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States affecting the right of suffrage and affecting elections, and pertains generally to the privileges of one-half the citizens of the United States, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of Thomas Galloway, late captain Company C, First Regiment Maryland Cavalry, for the correction of his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the memorial of Thomas B. Reed and other citizens of Portland, Maine, protesting against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and suggesting its modification; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOGY. I present a memorial from the leading merchants and business men of Saint Louis, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act, and asking that it be continued with certain amendments.

I will state, Mr. President, while I am up, that I hope the bankrupt act will not be disposed of for some time. In my own city I was of the impression that it was the wish of the entire business community that the act should be repealed, and yet since I have been in this city I have received many letters, and this memorial which I have just handed to the Clerk, signed by the leading men of my city engaged in business—manufacturers, steamboat-men, men of capital, men who are largely interested in the bankrupt law—protesting against its repeal, but all expressing a wish for its amendment. I therefore hope that that bill will be permitted to remain on the table for some time, so that it may go to the country, and let the business mind of the entire country and the professional mind of the country have time to examine the subject, and that we may hear fully from them. I came to this city last fall convinced that it was the wish of my constituents that the law should be repealed, and yet I perceive now that they do not desire its repeal, but desire its amendment, and I presume that such is the case with many others. In view of the importance of the subject, of its wide-spread importance, I do hope that the bill will remain on our table for some time, so that it may go to the country and engage the attention of the country.

Mr. CONKLING. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee being absent, and he having charge of the bill referred to, I venture to remind the Senator from Missouri that his purpose as indicated when the bill was reported is in accord with the wish expressed by the Senator. It is not, I think, the purpose of the chairman to move the consideration of this bill until such reasonable time has elapsed as will enable not only the members of the Senate but other persons interested in it to express their views. It is the purpose, with reasonable diligence I suppose, to proceed with it, but not in such haste as will prevent an expression of views here or elsewhere.

Mr. THURMAN. I think it proper to say, and the Senator who has just taken his seat will remember, that the Judiciary Committee itself expects to consider other amendments before the bill is finally acted upon, and if it should approve them will report them to the Senate. The report made by the Judiciary Committee is not complete. We reserve the right to make a further report when the bill shall be called up, if we see proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. CONOVER presented the memorial of Mrs. Ellen Call Long, praying for the payment of the claim of the heirs of Richard K. Call, in accordance with the judgment of the United States court of Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of the Hamilton County Grange, of Florida, asking Congress to pass a law refunding the tax on raw cotton to the producer; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Williamson Page, of North Carolina, praying compensation for carrying the United States mails in 1860 and 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, suggesting certain amendments to the act to provide a national currency; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, relating to a bill now pending in the Congress of the United States, to strengthen the credit of the reconstructed States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the General Assembly of South Carolina, in favor of the passage of the civil-rights bill now pending in Congress; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, in favor of compensation being made by the United States for damages done to the west wing of the citadel in Charleston by fire, while occupied by the United States Government; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, concerning the citadel of the city of Charleston, South Carolina; which was ordered to lie on the table.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I think it proper that I should state now that on the conclusion of the debate upon the resolution presented by the Committee on Finance I shall ask the Senate to take up the question of the Louisiana senatorial election. It is a privileged question, and it ought to be disposed of speedily for various reasons; and if there should be no one ready to proceed with the discussion on the financial resolution when the bill pending before the Senate has been disposed of, I shall ask the body then to proceed with the Louisiana senatorial election case.

Mr. STEVENSON. When the Louisiana election case is again before the Senate I shall move an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, to refer back that case to the Committee on Elections, with directions to take proof and inquire into certain matters touching the validity of the election of the Legislature by which the claim to elect a Senator was made.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Anderson & White be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Charles F. Sampson and others, principal owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained by them in consequence of the sinking of the schooner by the United States steamer Ticonderoga on the 1st of May, 1871, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in relation to the claim of Eliza Shelton and others for a pension be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac H. Allen, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 128) for the relief of T. C. Callicot, late Treasury agent at Charleston, South Carolina, George W. Clark, and Alexander McLeod, of South Carolina, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and he moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the memorial and papers of Woodhouse, Southmayd & Rudd, praying compensation for losses by the seizure of certain hides, skins, and wool on board the schooners Carrie and Arthur, at New York, have instructed me to report that the claim ought not to be allowed; and for the purpose of bringing it within the operation of the forty-ninth rule of the Senate, I ask that this report be now adopted, as there was an adverse report on the claim at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the adverse report of the committee.

The report was adopted.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George Brunk, of the State of Virginia, asking compensation for stock driven off by order of General Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report adversely, and to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. I wish to say in this connection that this claim belongs to a numerous class where there is nothing brought before the committee except simply a memorial, frequently, as in this case, sworn to, but accompanied by no evidence whatever. I notified the Senator who introduced it, before the recess, of the defect of proof. I endeavored to reach the attorney who seems to have been the means of bringing it before Congress. I do not hear from him. It may be a meritorious claim; but in the mean time I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of George Wright, reported adversely thereon, and it was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 204) for the relief of Robert Bent and Jack Smith, reported it without amendment.

SPECIE PAYMENTS—THE CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice, at the suggestion of several Senators, that, after the unfinished business is disposed of, I will press as hard as I can to get a vote on the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance. Several Senators have notified me of their desire to speak to it, and wish to know at what time they will have the opportunity. I simply wish to give notice that I desire to press the consideration of that resolution because the Committee on Finance are delayed in their examination of bills that come before them until they can ascertain the sense of the Senate. I hope, therefore, that those Senators who desire to engage in the debate will prepare themselves for it.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 256) for the relief of Williamson Page; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 257) granting pensions to Eliza Shelton, Nancy Shelton, Cerena Metcalf, Nancy King, Patsey J. Shelton, Sarah Metcalf, Cloa Shelton, and Mary Franklin, and their children under the age of sixteen years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 258) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in the insurrectionary States," approved May 9, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Cary; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not wish to present a bill now, but I have drawn one for which I have proposed a pretty good title, I think—"A bill to provide for the gradual withdrawal from circulation of irredeemable national notes and the substitution therefor of redeemable national-bank notes, to remove unjust restrictions upon banks of issue and upon the amount of circulation." I rose to give notice that if I should survive the pending debate on the question of salaries, I shall ask leave to present this bill in some pleasant morning hour, and I shall want perhaps thirty minutes to introduce it to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin gives notice of his intention to introduce a certain bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to inquire whether the Postmaster-General has yet furnished to the Senate the information asked for by a resolution passed before our vacation in reference to the franking privilege. It has not been placed on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the resolution to which the Senator refers has not been responded to as yet by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator from New Jersey who has the floor on the resolution of the Committee on Finance is not present, I will not now call it up, but I will move to take up the unfinished business of yesterday

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask that a resolution which I offered the day before yesterday may be taken up, for the purpose of reference to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

Mr. WRIGHT. I object. What is the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will make no remarks on the subject. I wish merely to refer a resolution on finance to the Committee on Finance. ["No objection."]

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that, if the unfinished business be laid aside so as not to lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection, and the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut is before the Senate.

TEMPORARY LOANS BY THE TREASURY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BUCKINGHAM on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That in order to prevent inflation of the currency, and to meet the necessities of the Government, the Committee on Finance be requested to consider the expediency of reporting a bill to the Senate which shall empower the Secretary of the Treasury to make temporary loans, and which shall authorize national banking associations to use certificates of indebtedness issued for such loans as a part of their reserve; also, to provide for the redemption and cancellation of legal-tender notes equal in amount to those which have been, or which may be hereafter, paid out of the $44,000,000 heretofore held by the Secretary.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance. I will make no remarks on it.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in obedience to the act of Congress of June 3, 1834, requiring a statement of the accounts of disbursing officers in the Indian Bureau.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection this communication will be laid on the table and be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think before that document is printed it had better be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending legislation authorizing the sale of the military reservation at Camp Crittenden and old Camp Grant, Arizona Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of State, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, the number of officers and employés in or connected with the Department of State who have been furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Postmaster-General, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, the number of officers and employés in or connected with the Post-Office Department who have been furnished with official postage-stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. WRIGHT. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $6,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall be at the rate of $2,000 in addition to his pay as Representative, amounting in all to $8,000; and that of the Vice-President shall be the same amount, with the same allowance for traveling expenses as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 3. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation o members of Congress and Delegates, and the several officers and employés of either House of Congress, or both, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries and compensation of all said persons shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the several heads of Departments shall be each $8,000 per annum.

The amendment to the amendment was to insert at the end of line 10 of the amendment of the committee the following:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per year, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall, in the aggregate, make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year, exclusive of mileage allowances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PRATT. If no gentleman wishes to speak in opposition to that amendment, I desire, having presented it myself, to submit a few words in support of it.

Let us, in the first place, see what the precise question before the Senate is. The committee to whom the House bill was referred reported a substitute, as follows:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the compensation of members of Congress and Delegates, and the several officers and employés of either House of Congress, or both, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries and compensation of all said persons shall be as fixed by the laws in force at at the time of the passage of said act.

SEC. 2. That the compensation of the several heads of Departments shall be each $8,000 per annum.

That is the whole of it. It will be perceived that the effect of this substitute, if it passes in this form, would be that the reduction of the compensation of members of Congress would commence from the passage of the bill. The effect of my amendment is to cause that reduction to relate back to the beginning of the Forty-third Congress. That amendment is as follows, to come in at the end of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per year, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall, in the aggregate, make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year, exclusive of mileage allowances.

Mr. President, I could not have imagined, when I offered this amendment, that it would have provoked the hostility that it has. It has been attacked on various grounds. There has been a great deal of bad logic, I think, expended in the way of argument, and some little sneering which would be probably better appreciated outside of this Chamber than in it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to call attention to the phraseology of the amendment. It is entirely different from what I understood it yesterday. I understood it to be an amendment which would fix the pay of all Senators from the passage of this bill at such an amount as would, when added to the $3,250, or whatever amount they should have received or were entitled to receive under the present law, make $10,000 for the Congress. I have no doubt of the constitutionality of such an amendment; but the amendment as now read, which I have carefully listened to for the first time this morning, is not such an amendment at all. It is not the one I indorsed yesterday; at least I did not then understand it as I understand it now.

The amendment as it is now drawn discriminates from this time forth as to the pay of Senators in this Chamber. That cannot be done constitutionally, in my opinion. We can figure on this question; we can ascertain just what every Senator has received; we presume that they have received all that they are entitled to; if they have not they have but to go to the office and draw the money; it is there for them; they have received, or may to-day obtain, $6,250. Now, then, let us fix the pay of all Senators from this time out at $3,750, if that is the proper amount.

Mr. MORTON. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion in response to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. His proposition is that the salary, after a certain time, shall be made, say, $2,400 or $2,500 a year for the balance of what is called this Congress, and in that way the whole thing may be equalized. His point is that all Senators must at the same time receive the same compensation, and that it may not be varied in amount by debiting upon future payments the amount of back pay, which varied. That is the point.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is it.

Mr. MORTON. Now, I will ask the Senator, with how much justice will that operate in the future? We are to have a new Senator here from California in a few days—he may be here this week; and then his pay will be, say, $2,400 a year. You cannot increase it in any way, because the pay of all Senators at the same time must be equal, according to the Senator's argument. We shall have a new Senator here probably from Kansas, or it may be that they will return my distinguished friend, Judge CROZIER. I cannot say how that is. But we shall have a Senator here from Kansas by election in the course of a week or two, and then he must receive his pay for the rest of this Congress at the rate of $2,400 or $2,500 a year. That is conceded not to be enough, and there is no way of making it up, because the pay of each Senator for the same days must be the same. I submit to my friend that the substitute which he suggests would be unjust in certain cases.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend from Indiana indulge me further?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I was discussing yesterday and to-day a mere constitutional question. I say it is within the constitutional power of Congress to do this thing. I am not saying that we shall get pay enough for our services from this time. I am not saying that the Senator who comes here from California will be well compensated for his services; but he will receive as much as any other Senator will during the same time. This would in my opinion be constitutional. When the Senator from California gets here, he may naturally regret that he came at a time when the salary was so low. That is his misfortune. But it does not touch the constitutional power of this Congress to fix the pay at that figure. I do not say that it will be comfortable; I do not think it will be.

Mr. MORTON. My friend mistakes my idea. I suggested that it would not be just to put the new Senators upon a short allowance in order to make arrangements for those who have been getting an increased pay since the 4th of March.

Mr. CARPENTER. It may not be just. I was not discussing that question. I was not discussing the justice of repealing this law at all. I was discussing a pure, simple question of constitutional law; that is, the constitutional power of this body to do a certain thing. I say we can fix the amount for our services from this time, so that every Senator will receive for the two years no more than $10,000, and still on every day of every session every Senator in the Chamber will have received or be entitled to draw the same sum. I say that is constitutional. I do not say that the Senators coming in will get pay enough. I do not think any of us are to have pay enough. But the new Senators will receive the same that other Senators receive for the same term. Whether this is fair or not, it is constitutional.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to ask my friend from Wisconsin, since he has heard the amendment of the Senator from Indiana read, if he understood the question which I put to him yesterday?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do; and I apologize to the Senator from Illinois. Yesterday I did not understand his question, and I could not, for the reason that I was mistaken as to the character of the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I do not share the constitutional scruples of my learned friend from Wisconsin; but I had prepared an amendment, in case the present one should be voted down, which probably meets his views, as it meets the views of some other Senators who have opposed the pending amendment, which I will read for information:

Provided, however, That the compensation of the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress shall be at the rate of $7,500 for the year ending March 3, 1874, and shall be at the rate of $2,500 for the year ending March 3, 1875, exclusive of mileage and allowances.

That I understand to meet the views of the Senator from Wisconsin and of some other gentlemen who have addressed the Senate on this question.

But, sir, to return to the objections which have been made against the pending amendment, the first proposition which I make in answer to all of the objections which have been urged against it is this: In now changing the compensation of members of Congress from $7,500 a year to $5,000 a year, we do so in obedience to the will of the people, to the pronounced popular judgment. So my friend from Wisconsin has just announced to the Senate. He says that despite his own convictions on the subject he is going to vote for this reduction because the people, his masters, demand it. Now, sir, the point I make is this, that if it was wrong on the 3d of March, 1873, to raise the salary from $5,000 to $7,500 a year, it has been wrong every day since, and we are wrong-doers in having received compensation under that law, and should either return it to the Treasury or else it should be deducted from our compensation in future. I do not see how we can escape from that conclusion. The whole argument of my friend from Wisconsin is this: He yields to this demand because the people have willed it; because they have determined that this increase of salary was wrong. I submit to him that the same people likewise demand that this bill which we are now considering should relate back to the 4th of March, 1873, so that at no period should we be in the receipt of more than $5,000 a year.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. If it be wrong to receive extra pay between the present time and the 4th of March last, was it not equally wrong to have received it previous to that period, between the 4th of March, 1873, and the 4th of March, 1871?

Mr. PRATT. I think so. I voted against the bill, and I refused to take the benefit of the back pay under it.

Mr. STEWART. Then why not go back to 1871 and deduct the amount received in excess from the present compensation?

Mr. PRATT. That is not a measure that is pending before the Senate at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I have been trying to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. PRATT. It will be competent for the Senator, I suppose, when the pending amendment is disposed of, to introduce an amendment of that sort.

Mr. STEWART. If the Senator's objection was out of the way on the question of order, I could have it before the Senate now and get a vote on it first.

Mr. PRATT. I do not suppose it is proper, and it has been so ruled by the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. I know it is not in order now; but if we could have unanimous consent we could come right square to the point and vote upon it.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the second proposition which I make is, that upon every increase which has been made by Congress of the compensation of its members, the increase has related back uniformly to the beginning of the Congress when the increase was made. The compensation has been changed some five or six times, and I repeat, that wherever that increase has been made it has related back to the beginning of that Congress. If that be correct as a principle, why should not the decrease of compensation be governed by the same principle, and the decreased relate back to the beginning of the Congress?

Now, take our legislation from 1789 down to the present time. The first compensation was a per-diem allowance of six dollars per day. The first increase was from six dollars to seven dollars per day; the next increase was to eight dollars a day; the next to $1,500 a year; the next to $3,000; and then, in 1866, an increase was made to $5,000, and in 1873 to $7,500. There has been but one instance, I believe, since the institution of this Government when the compensation of members of Congress was decreased, and that took place in the year 1818. The previous Congress had increased the compensation from six dollars or eight dollars a day, whatever it was, to $3,000 for the Congress, or $1,500 a year. There was great complaint made of that increase, and the succeeding Congress promptly repealed the law, decreasing the compensation to eight dollars a day, and made that decrease relate back to the commencement of that Congress. I have the act here by me if any Senator has any question upon that subject.

Mr. HOWE. I had a question on that very point. I understood that that act took effect at the termination of the Congress which passed it. It is a long time since I have seen it.

Mr. CONKLING. While my friend from Indiana is interrupted, may I request him to send his amendment to the Chair, that some of us may have an opportunity of knowing what it is—the present amendment?

Mr. PRATT. The pending amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to send it to the Chair, so that we can resort to it?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

I have the act of Congress here, which I will read for the benefit of my friend from Wisconsin. It was passed on the 22d of January, 1818. The first section relates to the compensation of Senators, and the second section to the compensation of members of the House of Representatives; but as they are both of similar import, the reading of the first section, I presume, will be sufficient:

Be it enacted, &c., That at every session of Congress, and every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress, after the 3d day of March, in the year 1817—

This act was passed on the 22d day of January, 1818, a period of more than ten months after the beginning of that Congress—

each Senator shall be entitled to receive eight dollars for every day he has attended or shall attend the Senate, and also be allowed eight dollars for every twenty miles of estimated distance, by the most usual road, from his place of residence to the seat of Congress, at the commencement and end of every such session and meeting; and that all sums for travel already performed be due and payable at the time of passing this act, &c.

And then the act goes on to provide for absenteeism, except in case of sickness, &c.

Mr. HOWE. But the date fixed for the commencement of that act was the commencement of the Congress, was it not?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; of that Congress.

Mr. HOWE. And prior to the passage of that law there was no law regulating the salaries of members of Congress.

Mr. PRATT. I beg the Senator's pardon. There was a law fixing it at $3,000 a Congress, or $1,500 a year.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is mistaken. He will find upon more careful examination, I think, that, the preceding Congress having repealed the statute, which proved very obnoxious, and which had increased salaries, they made that repealing act take effect at the close of that Congress, thereby leaving upon the statute-book no law whatever regulating salaries; and the law which the Senator reads was passed for that purpose. That is my recollection.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator may be right about that. I have the previous law of March 19, 1816, before me, and, as it is a short one, we will settle the question by reading it:

Be it enacted, &c., That instead of the daily compensation now allowed by law, there shall be paid annually to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, of this and every future Congress of the United States, the following sums, respectively, that is to say: to the President of the Senate pro tempore, when there is no Vice-President, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, $3,000 each; to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives other than the Speaker, and Delegate, the sum of $1,500: Provided, nevertheless, That in case any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall not attend in his place at the day on which Congress shall convene, or shall absent himself before the close of the session, a deduction shall be made from the sum which would otherwise be allowed to him, in proportion to the time of his absence, saving to the cases of sickness the same provisions as are established by existing laws.

That is the whole of it, except the concluding clause.

Mr. HOWE. That is quite enough of that; but has not the Senator discovered a law subsequent to that, and which repealed that law?

Mr. PRATT. No, sir, I have not; and I have looked very diligently. The very next act on the subject appears to be the one I have already quoted, of January 22, 1818. If there be any intervening act, I have not seen it.

Mr. ALLISON. You will find another act, dated February 6, 1817.

Mr. PRATT. I was not aware of that. I had overlooked it.

Mr. CONKLING. I asked the Senator a moment ago if he would send his modified amendment to the Chair, which I am seeking diligently to know about. I have the Senator's printed amendment, but I understand he proposes this morning to modify it.

Mr. PRATT. I stated in the beginning of my remarks that in case the pending amendment were voted down, I should offer a substitute, which I read for the information of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Senator. I supposed his modification was pending now—that we were to act upon it.

Mr. PRATT. No, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him once more, I will not annoy him again.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. And I do it by way of suggesting to him this modification of his amendment, after the proper preface:

That the compensation of Senators and Representatives from and after the passage of this act, for the residue of the term of service of the Forty-third Congress, shall be such a sum as will, when added to the amount which said Senators and Representatives shall have received, or been entitled to receive, under the existing law, amount to $10,000 for the term of service of said Forty-third Congress, and shall be paid monthly.

That expresses clearly what I supposed the amendment of the Senator was yesterday, and in my opinion is entirely constitutional, and for it I shall vote. The amendment proposed by the Senator, in my judgment, is unconstitutional, and I shall have to vote against it. I therefore suggest this to him.

Mr. PRATT. Before the vote is taken I will consider the modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HOWE. I now ask the permission of my friend from Indiana to introduce the act which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has kindly placed in my hands, and to which he has called his attention—the act of February 6, 1817.

Mr. PRATT. On what page of the Statutes at Large?

Mr. HOWE. Page 345, of volume 3. It is entitled "An act to repeal, after the close of the present session of Congress, the act entitled 'An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives and the Delegates from Territories,' passed the 19th of March, 1816"—the act which the Senator has just read—and it declares,

That from and after the close of the present session of Congress, the act entitled "An act to change the mode of compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives and the Delegates from Territories," passed the 19th of March, 1816, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to revive any act or acts or parts of acts repealed or suspended by the act hereby repealed.

At the time this act passed, I think there was no law regulating the compensation of members until the act was passed which the Senator has just read.

Mr. PRATT. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] is clearly right. I had not seen that act before, though I supposed I had found everything that there was on the subject.

There is but one consideration more, then, Mr. President, which I wish to submit to the Senate; and that is in reply to the objections of my friends from Illinois and Wisconsin. They complain that there will be inequality between the compensation of members of Congress; they complain that they will have to refund money which they have already received under the existing law, and the complaint is that this is violative, if not of the letter, at least of the spirit, of the Constitution, as impairing the obligation of the contract under which the money was paid.

This position would have great force in case it were well founded; but the amendment which I have offered is prospective in its operation; it compels no Senator, no member of the House of Representatives, to refund a dollar of the money which he has received under the act of March 3, 1873. Under that law the compensation for the entire Congress would be $15,000. Up to the 4th day of January in this present year the compensation under that law amounts to the sum of $6,250. That, subtracted from the compensation established by this bill, ($10,000 per Congress,) leaves $3,750 yet to be paid to members of Congress, to be distributed over the fourteen months remaining of the Forty-third Congress; and, according to my calculation, that will leave $268 per month to be paid to each member of Congress in the future. Nothing is to be returned whatever; so that I think that objection is not well taken. This amendment contemplates no return to the Treasury of any dollar that has been received under an existing law, but fixes the compensation in the future so that those who have received under the existing law $625 a month will hereafter, during the remaining fourteen months of this Congress, receive but $268 a month. That is the whole of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator sits down I beg to ask a question. I want to vote for whatever is thorough on this subject, if I can find out what it is; and I should like to make an inquiry touching this amendment as it now stands in print. If I understand it aright, it relates to no member of Congress of either House whatever, excepting those who have drawn compensation at the rate of $7,500 a year. Therefore it says that Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 a year, in accordance with the act, and no other members of Congress, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall in the aggregate make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year, exclusive of mileage. Now, I beg to ask my friend what is to be the fate or the fortune of those members who have not drawn their pay up to this time, as in the case of any member who has been absent, or who, because abroad, or for any reason, has not drawn his compensation at all up to this time; is he to go on hereafter and have $7,500 a year; and if he is not, what statute is to touch him except the statute which exists now? I may not state my point clearly, but if the Senator comprehends me, I wish he would give me his view in that matter.

Mr. PRATT. I understand the Senator perfectly. My amendment was drawn on the supposition that every member of Congress had drawn his compensation at the rate established by the act of March 3, 1873. It does not in terms embrace those who have not drawn that compensation. When the point was made I prepared hastily an amendment to the amendment that I designed to offer, in order to embrace those cases, which, with the Senator's permission, I will read for his information:

And provided further, That in all cases where any Senator, Representative, or Delegate of the Forty-third Congress shall not have drawn the full rate of compensation provided by the said act since the 4th day of March, 1873, such sum so undrawn and in excess of the rate of compensation of $5,000 per year herein provided, shall be covered into the Treasury by the disbursing officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator that that will not meet the difficulty, if it be one. I will take the case of the new Senator from California—understood to be on his way. He comes here. He falls neither within the category described in the print nor within that provided in the contingent amendment that the Senator holds in his hand. What law would operate upon him? There is no pay here for him which has been undrawn. He has drawn no pay at the rate of $7,500 a year. He is not described at all. Would he not have the right to draw under the law as it now exists?

Mr. PRATT. I suggest that his predecessor, who has but recently resigned his seat in this body, has probably drawn his compensation under the existing law.

Mr. CONKLING. But that does not aid him at all. This present Senator is not his own predecessor. His own predecessor has gone. He comes here in his own right. He finds, if this act shall be adopted before he arrives here, on the statute-book an act which has no reference to him whatever. It describes two classes of persons; he belongs to neither. Where does he look for the authority under which he is to be paid?

Mr. PRATT. I suggest to my friend from New York that he is quite competent to draw an amendment that will meet that and cover every possible case that may arise, not embraced in my amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend is very complimentary, but he is very unsatisfactory. I was trying to learn how I could vote for this amendment. If I am to be committed to my capacity to draw an amendment, my extremity will be great indeed.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I wish to say a very few words regarding this bill, and perhaps regarding the amendment, and I shall speak of them both together.

I think that the present salary or compensation of Senators and Representatives in Congress is as nearly right as it can be made. In exercising our constitutional function of ascertaining by law the amount of compensation, we are not to consider our own interests, but simply the public interest, just as in legislating upon anything else; and in my judgment in the occupation of politics, as well as in every other occupation, higher compensation will command higher average capacity and ability; and upon that ground, solely as a matter of public interest, it is my opinion that a salary of $7,500 is wiser than one of $5,000. That being so, I shall, of course, vote against the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, the amendment of our own committee, and the House bill.

Here I might stop, but I feel compelled to notice a portion of the reasoning which has been urged by different Senators in behalf of the bill and of the amendment.

Half a dozen Senators have said that they believe just as I do, that the present salary is the wiser of the two, the better for the public interest, and yet that they intend to vote to change it to one which they think worse for the public interest; and why? The people, they say, demand it. I might say that I doubt the fact; but if the fact were so, is that a good reason for a Senator to vote confessedly on the wrong side?

I confess, sir, that I have been a little shocked at some language which I have heard here. This is indeed a Government of the people, for in the preamble to the Constitution we find it is the people of the United States who ordained and established that instrument, and this Government is the product of the Constitution. But it is not a government by the people; its essential function is the law-making power; and by that same Constitution, on its very forefront, the law-making power, "all legislative power," "shall be vested," where? In the people? Is that our Government? Not at all, sir. The law-making power in this Government of ours is "vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." "Vested" there is the language. That is where the law-making power resides. This Government of ours, thank God and the wisdom of our fathers, is not the government of a mob blown about by every wind, it is a government of law; and the people through the highest exponent of their will, the Constitution, have said that we, the Congress of the United States, shall possess all law-making power; and when we make that law the people must obey.

Sir, I am sick of this talk about Congress being the servants of the people and the people being our masters. In no constitutional sense is this true; and when the day shall come that it shall be literally true, let us look for the government of the September days of the old French revolution, instead of the wise institutions that our fathers gave us.

And now, sir, because as a legislator it is my duty to vote upon every matter of legislation according as I believe to be for the true interest of this people, I vote against the bill and all amendments. But there have been some things said about these amendments also which seem to me to demand a word or two of comment. Senators have said that ever since the 4th of March last we have been wronging the people in accepting the compensation provided for us by law. Sir, when I believe that of myself I will resign my seat and go home. Do these gentlemen who believe that the people have demanded a repeal of the retroactive features of the act of last spring also believe that the people want American Senators to come like whipped hounds to lick their masters' feet, admitting that they have been swindling their constituency for ten months of the current year? I do not believe it, sir. They may do so in the Northwest; but if they do, they have sadly degenerated from their New England fathers. No, sir; the people want to be represented by Senators and Representatives who will ask not whether they will be popular, but whether they are doing right.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it was not my purpose at the outset of this debate to say one word in addition to casting my vote upon this amendment and the bill; but the discussion has taken such a wide range, such a multiplicity of reasons and considerations have been suggested why the amendment ought to be adopted, that I deem it worth while to say a word or two in vindication of the vote I propose to cast, and in doing so I shall not measure my judgment or my conscience by that of any other person.

I object to this amendment upon two grounds: First, in my judgment it is an infraction of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, and subversive of private right. Secondly, it proposes to accomplish by indirection what it is admitted cannot be accomplished directly.

And now let us see if I am correct in these positions; and in order to do so I beg to make a brief reference to the constitutional provision which authorizes compensation to members of Congress. The Constitution provides in these words:

> The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

There are two things material to be considered just at this point. The first is, that members of Congress shall receive a compensation. What, I ask, is the measure of that compensation? Suppose that Congress should provide that each member should receive ten dollars a month; would that be a compliance with the Constitution? Suppose, on the other hand, that Congress should provide that each member should receive $10,000 a month; would that be a compliance with that provision of the Constitution? Manifestly not.

What, then, is the meaning of this provision, when it says that the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation? Why, sir, according to the plain meaning of the Constitution as well as according to all rules of construction of constitutions and statutes, it means a reasonable compensation, no more and no less. But what is a reasonable compensation? That is left to the judgment of Congress; but that does not mean an arbitrary judgment. It means a reasonable judgment; it means an intelligent judgment; it means a judgment which leaves the conscience of an intelligent man at rest; it means a just and reasonable compensation. And if Congress shall undertake, simply because they have the power to do it, to say that members of Congress shall have ten dollars per month on the one hand or shall have $10,000 per month on the other hand, in either case it is a plain violation of the spirit of the Constitution; nay, sir, I say it is a violation of the letter of the Constitution.

Then the meaning of this clause is that Congress shall provide, under the circumstances of the country, a reasonable compensation for its members, and that is to be ascertained by a statute; and when it is so ascertained, the amount so provided vests a right in each member of Congress; and when he receives the money, that money is his as absolutely as his horse, which he has paid for and received. If that is the proper construction of this clause of the Constitution, let us see how the matter stands.

At the last session of Congress an act was passed which provides in these words:

> Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, (including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in the Forty-second Congress, holding such office at the passage of this act and whose claim to a seat has not been adversely decided,) shall receive $7,500 per annum each.

That is as much of the act as is material for my purpose. And here let me remark that Congress is charged with the power of deciding what is reasonable, and each member of Congress is bound upon his oath to decide what is reasonable; for if he exceeds it on the one hand or on the other, he has violated his official obligation, and he has violated the Constitution of his country. The Forty-third Congress, in the exercise of its power, and bound to exercise it as I have insisted, said that $7,500 a year was reasonable compensation under the circumstances of the country at that time. What was the effect of that provision? It created a right in every member of Congress which he might exercise at any time he should please until that law should be repealed or the compensation should be changed. It created a right by which he might demand $7,500 per year; but he might not only do it per year; he might do it every hour; he might do it every day. Suppose he died at the end of three months, it is manifest that his estate would be entitled to a pro rata part of his yearly salary. The salary accrued; it became due every hour of every day after the act passed, and he might demand it; but for convenience it is paid monthly. When the act was passed this right was created absolutely, and it was a right which, by no possible means, he could be deprived of; and when he received the money in pursuance of that act it became as absolutely his as his horse in his stable, or the coat upon his back. That is the state of the law.

Now let us see what this amendment proposes. It is unconstitutional in this, it is an invasion of the spirit of the Constitution in this, that it proposes not to give each Senator a reasonable compensation from this time forward; but it provides, in substance, that from this time forward each Senator shall not receive a reasonable compensation until such time as, if he did receive a reasonable compensation, the amount that he has received from the 4th of March last to this date in excess of $5,000 a year shall be returned to the Government. I say that is a plain violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. It is so because the effect of the provision is to keep each Senator from receiving a reasonable compensation for a given period, which the Constitution declares he shall have. It seems to me that that view of it is manifest. To make it a little plainer, a reasonable compensation it is said is $5,000. For each of the coming twelve months we are not to receive by this provision the one-twelfth of $5,000, but we are to receive such sum less than $5,000 as will put back into the Treasury what we have already received in excess of $5,000 since the 4th of March last. The effect of the provision is to take away that which the law gives me from this time forward as it did in the past, to wit, a reasonable compensation, and therefore manifestly it is a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution.

But, sir, I have another objection to the proposed amendment. It seems to me that it is very unworthy of the Congress of the United States, and through the Congress of the United States, if this amendment shall be adopted, unworthy of the American people. What is that? It proposes to do by indirection what it is admitted cannot be done directly. It is admitted that if an act of Congress were passed authorizing the Attorney-General to direct a suit to be instituted to recover back the back-pay allowance that members of the Forty-second Congress received, the Government could not recover a dollar. It is admitted that if actions were instituted to collect from the present members of Congress the amount of money they have received in excess of $5,000 a year since the 4th of March last, the Government could not recover a single farthing. Why? Because by reason of the law as it exists the money which each member of Congress has received, the money which has been set apart for him under this act of Congress, is his absolutely. But seeing that, this proposed amendment goes round about, circumventing the members of Congress and forcing them by indirect means to do that which cannot be accomplished by direct action; forcing them to deprive themselves of that reasonable compensation which the Constitution provides they shall have.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I feel constrained in my conscience to vote against this amendment. It is, I repeat, an infraction of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution; it is a direct invasion of private right; and then again it is undertaking to accomplish by circumvention, by indirect means, that which the law forbids; and it is doing that which I trust the American Senate will not consent to do. Of course I mean to imply no reflection upon the very excellent gentlemen who have advocated a different view on this subject.

And now, sir, let me say a word in reference to the vote I shall cast upon the amendment to the House bill reported by our committee. In my judgment, in my conscience, I believe the salary that members of Congress receive now is not too great; but I do not hesitate to say that I shall vote to cut down the compensation of members of Congress. And why? Because I believe that the popular sentiment of the country demands it. I concur in the excellent sentiments expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] a moment ago; but I maintain that while we are the law-making power, and this is a Government of law, and all legislative power is vested in the Congress, it is our duty, as Senators of the American Congress, to give ear to the people of the country. They are our constituents, and when we ascertain that there is a deliberately expressed will, (and I feel certain there can be no doubt about it in this case,) I think something is due to public sentiment. I am the more ready to pursue that course for the reason that I have a personal interest in the vote I shall cast. I am placed in a delicate position. I am called upon to cast a vote that is in my own interest, and against, possibly, the interests of the peoplee; and, inasmuch as this vote does not involve a question of conscience as to the amount, and there is a difference of opinion about what is a reasonable compensation, I feel authorized to cast a vote for the reduction of the pay to what would seem to be a reasonable compensation in the judgment of a majority of Congress; or, at all events, the manifest judgment of the American people.

I beg pardon, sir, for having detained the Senate. I thought it due to myself to make these remarks in vindication of the vote I shall cast.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I had hoped when this bill was reported that it would be acted upon promptly, without much debate. All the questions that have been discussed here for two days were fairly considered by a committee of this body, and this bill was reported as, I believe, the unanimous result of the conversations of that committee. The questions that have been discussed here now for two days are much better discussed in committee, where members can express their minds freely and compare opinions with each other better than they can in a larger body like this.

The committee reported that in their judgment it was wise to go back to the salary fixed for members of Congress prior to the 3d of March, 1873. Some of the members of that committee believed that they ought to do it, because $5,000 a year was enough, as measured by the profit and compensation received by men of equal ability with ourselves in the various walks of private life. It may be, and no doubt is, true that in some of the larger cities lawyers and other professional men receive much larger compensation; but take the country as a whole, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing; take the yearly earnings of those from whose ranks we are chosen, and the average compensation of men of high ability, fit to adorn the Senate, is not $5,000 a year. Some of the members of this committee were actuated by the idea that this was a reasonable and fair compensation. Other members no doubt yielded to the demand made by the public voice.

Now, sir, while it may be true as a constitutional question that Congress passes laws and is the law-making power, yet it is also true that the popular judgment—not of a mob, but the deliberate judgment of the people of the United States—gathered in any way we can, is on all questions to be fairly considered, and on all questions which involve our personal interest is much more likely to be correct than our own. There is a rule of the common law that no man shall be a judge in his own case. Although I do not believe that any one who hears me now would be influenced by the fact that his own interests are involved in this question, yet it is the wisdom of the law that in ordinary cases we could not be called upon to decide these questions. Although the Constitution does confer upon Congress the power to regulate its own compensation, that grew out of the necessity of the case, because the Constitution could not have made a fixed rule; but as a matter of fact, as a matter of correct practice, no Congress ought to fix its compensation except for the future. There can be no doubt about this. The necessity of the case, however, has compelled Congress at different times to regulate its own compensation in fixing the pay for the future. But these are questions that I do not propose to consider.

The committee, after a careful consideration of this subject, with the House bill and with all the debate in the House before them, concluded that it was better from this time forth, from the passage of this bill to restore the salary of $5,000 a year and the ordinary allowances and mileage. It is true that objections were at once made that the old mileage system was objectionable, was unequal, by giving to members from remote States a greater proportion than was their due. On the other hand, it was insisted that men who come from a great distance, from their business and from their families, ought to have some additional compensation, more than the mere expense of traveling from their remote place of residence to this point. Other considerations operated. At any rate, this was a long-established system, that had not given rise to much complaint; and if there was any gross injustice in it, that might at any time be corrected by a reduction of the rate of mileage. If twenty cents a mile is now too high, owing to the cheapness of transportation, it can at any time, by a mere amendment of the law, be reduced to ten cents a mile. The committee thought it was better simply to restore the law as it was on the 3d of March, 1873; and there are grave and serious reasons why this system of mileage ought to be maintained, but perhaps at a lower rate than that now fixed by law.

In regard to other allowances, as to which so much complaint has been made, what are they? They are fixed and ascertained. We were allowed under the old law $125 per annum apiece to pay for the ordinary stationery and the incidents connected with the ordinary discharge of our duty. It is true the newspapers say that five or ten thousand knives are supplied to members of the Senate. If so, they are paid for by members of the Senate. The whole amount of our allowance as fixed by law is $125 to each member, and that is not more than sufficient for the purpose. What other allowances are given? None other. No member of Congress can by any possibility draw from the public Treasury under the old law anything but his compensation, the $5,000 a year, the mileage allowed by law, and this allowance for stationery. The franking privilege being repealed, as a matter of course we are relieved in great measure from the burden of franking public documents. The amount of postage that may be paid by any of us probably would range somewhere in the neighborhood of two or three hundred dollars a year. That may or may not be provided for, as Congress may hereafter deem wise. I say therefore, Mr. President, that the amendment reported by the committee is substantially correct.

As to the proposition now offered by the Senator from Indiana, I certainly would not vote for it. I have no more power and we have no more right to take from members of Congress money which they have earned and received in pursuance of law than we have the right to take your house or your farm or confiscate your property. It is their property, and although it is in the form of money, as exhibited here yesterday by my friend from Texas, [Mr. FLANAGAN,] what he has received is property—his property—and no man has a right to take it from him. With all due deference to my friend from Indiana, who I know would never like to do anything by indirection, I do say that the legal effect of his amendment is by indirection, by a device, to take money from the pockets of the men who earned it, and hold it and have it now by law. Why, sir, what is the proposition? Senators are discussing the various forms in which the proposition may be put. They say if it is framed in such and such words it is constitutional, but if framed in other words it is unconstitutional. Sir, I care not in what form you put it, it is unjust, and therefore I will not vote for it. I would not vote for it under any demand.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to ask my friend from Ohio one question with his permission.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. He is satisfied with the bill as reported by the committee, fixing the compensation for the future at $10,000 a Congress, as I understand?

Mr. SHERMAN. Five thousand dollars a year.

Mr. PRATT. Five thousand a year. Does my amendment disturb that rule? Does my amendment reduce the compensation of the Forty-third Congress below the sum of $10,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will show the Senator in a moment. In the first place I do not think we have any right, by any device, to take money that a man has earned now under the law; and we are bound in legislating for the future (for which only have we a right to legislate) to give to members of Congress a fair compensation.

Mr. PRATT rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, let me look at the effect of it, if my friend will not interrupt me, and I hope he will not. This habit of interrupting Senators has grown to be so common, that our debates are turned into conversational wrangles, instead of ordinary debates where each man has his say and then sits down. I will show in figures the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. By the 1st of February next, which is the earliest period when by any possibility this repealing bill can take effect, we shall have received under the present law $6,875. That will leave of the $10,000 for the whole Congress still to be drawn $3,125. If I am correct, from the 1st of February next until the close of the present Congress there will still be paid $3,125 under his proposition. That is at the rate of $2,400 a year, or $200 a month. Now, I ask my friend from Indiana whether he could say to any man in Indiana that $200 a month is a fair compensation for his services here as a member of Congress? Could he stand before any audience in Indiana (and I know they have very intelligent audiences there) and say, when he was called upon to fix a compensation for members of Congress, that, all things considered, he thought $2,400 was enough?

Mr. PRATT. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not now; not until I get through.

I am quite sure that he would not do it. Now he is fixing the compensation for members of Congress. If he tells me now that he fixes it at $2,400 from this time to the end of this Congress in order to compel the "salary-grabbers" or "back-pay" men to pay back that which they have got, then I say he is doing a rightful thing, a lawful thing, a thing he has the power to do, but for a bad purpose, which he has no right to do, and no right to accomplish. That is the way it strikes me. Sir, you have no more right to call upon members of Congress who have received their pay under the existing law to refund it than you have to go upon my farm in Ohio and drive me off it without color of title, under the plea that you want it for public uses. The Constitution says that you may take it for public uses, but you must compensate me for it. You have no right to take this money, and I would not, for one, vote directly or indirectly in such a way as to show that it was the purpose of Congress by any contrivance to compel men to refund that which they now hold by law.

This is all I desire to say in regard to this class of amendments, which seek to make this bill retroactive. That was one of the worst features of the act of March 3, 1873, with due deference to those who voted for it, although I had no doubt about their power to make it retroactive. The popular objection against that law was that it was retroactive. The people now do not demand of us to make our law retroactive. The Senator from Indiana is now doing precisely what he himself complains was done last March, by making the compensation retroactive. He is endeavoring to make his amendment retroactive. That is not right. There is scarcely a case that I can conceive of in which it would be right or just to make a law retroactive. The Constitution forbids us from passing an ex post facto law. We cannot punish a man criminally for doing what, at the time he did it, was innocent; nor should we, in any way, pass laws to have an operation in the past. I would not vote for any such law unless under very peculiar circumstances.

Mr. President, there are one or two other points that have been made on which I desire to say a word, because I do not wish to speak on this bill again. When the committee reported this bill they considered other questions, which, I see from the amendments prepared all around me, are to be presented, and we have got to debate them over again; and I wish now in advance to give, as near as I can, the reasons why we did not do so and so.

In the first place, it is said that the President of the United States had the benefit of this increase of salary act, it raising his salary from $25,000 up to $50,000 a year, and that if we are now disposed, either in deference to public opinion or because we think it is right, to go back to the old salary, we ought to put the President in the same position. I could not answer that argument if we had the power to do it. If the same public opinion which controls the votes of some members—it does not control mine, because I think the salary of $5,000 is enough—and induces them to go back to $5,000 a year, is to apply to members of Congress, it may be asked, why not go back to $25,000 for the President? The answer at once is that the Constitution of the United States forbids us to do so.

But, they say, let us do it any way; let us repeal the law of March 3, 1873, and not say anything about the President. Well, sir, if we do that, we do what we know we have not the constitutional power to do.

But, they say, the courts will set aside our action. I trust in God the Congress of the United States will never allow the courts to set aside our action in passing a law that we know to be unconstitutional; and no man now can touch the salary of the President of the United States, during his term of office, in the slightest degree, without violating the oath which he took at your desk, sir, and which ought to be sacred to him at every hour of his life. It is utterly impossible for him to do it; and we ought not to pass a law which by any construction would assert the power to do what the Constitution forbids us doing. Therefore it was that the committee omitted from the operation of this bill the President of the United States, whose salary is now protected by the Constitution; and we cannot touch it to the amount of five cents.

The same observation would apply to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. But it is said that there is a vacancy in the Supreme Court which may be filled after the passage of this act; other vacancies may occur from time to time, and let us pass an act that will operate upon future judges. That would be manifestly unfair. There ought to be one equal rule, applying to all the existing judges and those to be appointed in the future. Therefore you cannot make a discrimination there.

But there is another reason. I would not reduce the salary of these judges if I had the absolute power to do it, because I believe the judges of the highest tribunal of the United States are not too highly paid when they receive $10,000 a year. They are secluded; they are excluded from all other employment; they are separated from the mass of the people, nearly, to hold even the scales of justice. That is not our position. We are members of Congress, representatives of States. We are at liberty to pursue nearly all the vocations of life. We can engage in our professions during the time that we are not here employed in the public service. We are not cramped and crippled by those rules of propriety which guard and protect the Supreme Court of the United States. Therefore, in measuring our compensation, we are not to be governed by the same rules and the same principles that we would be governed by in fixing the compensation of the judges of the Supreme Court. I do not think their compensation is too high. As far as my constituents are concerned, I never have heard any one complain about the reasonable increase of the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In regard to the President of the United States, heretofore, while his salary was fixed at $25,000 a year, it was supported and aided by direct appropriations made by Congress, so that, instead of $25,000 a year, the President has for many years, away back into the time of Andrew Jackson and from thence down, been paid for certain matters which ordinarily enter into the private expenses of every citizen, in order to add to his salary of $25,000 a year. If, then, we think the salary now fixed by the Constitution and the law is too high at $50,000, we have it in our power, to the extent that we desire, to the extent we think is fair and right, to cut off those additional appropriations that have been made from time to time in addition to the salary of the President of the United States; so that we are not beyond remedy to reduce the incidental expenses of the Executive office if we think the compensation is sufficient to enable the President to pay these things out of his own salary.

These are the points that will be made in regard to this bill. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] yesterday said that the salary law of March 3, 1873, did increase some officers not named by me. It is true the salary bill did increase the pay of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury. They are the only officers, I believe, the Senator found.

Mr. LOGAN. The Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, of the Interior, and of the State Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a matter entirely in the discretion of the Senate. The committee did not include in the bill any reduction in the compensation of those officers. They were put at $6,000 a year. If those offices are well filled by able men—and each of those Departments ought certainly to have a very able assistant—I do not think $6,000 a year is too high a salary. By the third section of the act of March 3 we fixed the salaries of the heads of Bureaus at $4,000 a year, and of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury at $5,000 a year; and therefore I do not think that a salary of $6,000 for the three or four assistants in these great Departments of the Government is too high. Let any Senator, if he thinks it too high, present that question, and then the matter is left as it now stands in the bill.

As to the heads of Departments, I do not know that $10,000 a year is too much. Perhaps it is not. Eight thousand dollars a year was given to them before. That would depend very much on the way they managed their office. If a salary of $10,000 was given to them, and no other contingency, or expense, or allowance, or anything else, was given to them, I should not think it was too much; but under all the circumstances I think they would not suffer much if their salary was put where it was before the act of March 3 was passed.

Mr. President, these are the general ideas that operated upon me in agreeing to report this bill. Is it not wiser and better in a question of this kind, which can be discussed with much more care in a committee room, to leave the general results, the general details, to the committee, rather than to go into all these matters by way of amendment and debate here in the Senate, occupying very valuable time? It was with this view and actuated by this idea when this bill was first called up by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] having charge of it, that I felt like appealing to the Senate to take a vote at once upon it or any amendment that might be offered, without too many embarrassing amendments—to go on and dispose of it as a matter of ordinary legislation. Indeed, it seems to me that the whole trouble about this salary bill is that we attach too much importance to it. We seem to be acting as if we were under a scourge and wanted to resent it a little and express our indignation against the scourge, and not go on in the ordinary discharge of business. Why, Senators, every day we sit here, we pass, sometimes without debate, upon questions involving many times the amount that is involved in this salary bill, questions that are ten times as important. This is one of the least of our duties, one of the least important of our acts, whether we shall have $5,000 or $7,500 a year. I would treat it and regard it as an act of ordinary legislation, to be disposed of promptly, without any unnecessary consumption of time; and I again apologize to the Senate for consuming so much now.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I did not suppose I should be tempted to say another word upon this bill, and I would not were it not that the Senator from Ohio has repeated an assertion which has been frequently made in this debate, against which I wish, before the debate closes, to put in my protest; and it is this, that nobody has doubted the constitutional power of Congress to vote to themselves what was termed the back pay for the Forty-second Congress. I am not going to make an argument upon the question, but I do wish, by way of protest, to state the position which I take about that particular bill under the Constitution. I read the language of the Constitution first:

> The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Now, sir, what was in 1873 the position of every member of Congress under this clause of the Constitution and the legislation which had been enacted under it? The act of 1866 had provided a compensation of $5,000 per annum for each member of Congress; the joint resolution of 1867 had provided that that compensation of $5,000 per annum should be paid monthly; and I suppose that when the law of March last received the signature of the President, I should not be far wrong if I asserted that every member of Congress had receipted to the disbursing officer for his compensation up to the third day of the month preceding the time when it was signed. Then, sir, each member of Congress had received a compensation ascertained by law, in full up to that time; and while I do not doubt the power of Congress to fix a compensation, and of the member of Congress to receive a compensation ascertained by law, I have looked in vain for anything which would justify the spirit at least of that legislation which would give two compensations ascertained by two laws for the same period.

I may be running against some constitutional law that has been promulgated by the present occupant of the chair, [Mr. CARPENTER,] who says that it is perhaps a constitutional duty to receive whatever Congress sees proper to vote; and, as I have said, I do not propose to argue the question; I only wish to state the proposition by way merely of statement and not of argument. That position, then, is, that the power of Congress having been exercised, and the compensation having been ascertained by law, and that compensation having been paid and received by each member of Congress, he had no constitutional right again to vote himself a second compensation for the same period. I wish to put in that protest against this general acquiescence in that feature of the law of March 3, 1873.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, in the discussion of this question it is impossible for a Senator to look upon it and treat it in the manner suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] as coolly and dispassionately as he would discuss or act upon any other subject before the Senate. He cannot do that. Senators around me cannot do that. I appeal to the honorable Senator from Indiana farthest from me [Mr. MORTON] in regard to the amount of humiliation that he had to endure—though I do not remember that he voted for the law—when in the canvass in the State of Ohio he was called upon to utter sentiments upon the question. I suppose he did not vote for the law; but he heard his colleagues in the Senate of the United States acting with him in the republican party proper in the country denounced as "thieves"—that was the term that was used in regard to them—and then, to make it peculiarly offensive, "salary-grabbers." He did not reciprocate any of that feeling, but he felt that his party friends were arraigned before the country for a supposed act of dereliction, which, if true, gave them a very low position in the scale of common honor and public decency; and when he defined his own position, I discovered from the public prints that he uttered no single word of denunciation against his colleagues who had voted for the bill or received the pay under the bill. He felt the delicacy of the position in which he stood. He could not, perhaps, in accordance with his own views of expediency, vindicate them, but he felt no disposition to condemn them. I say, therefore, under these circumstances—and I just happened to think of the fact that publicly the honorable Senator from Indiana did deliver some sentiments on this subject before the people—that we all felt in our turn the great humiliation of being a Senator, or of being a Representative in the other House, in connection with this law.

We know what the public prints have said; we know what our neighbors have said in regard to this matter; and when editors of the republican party were sorely pressed upon this question, one of them in my own State came to the very humiliating conclusion that in the present state of politics it had become necessary apparently that men of high honor and undoubted integrity should be stricken down in the common slaughter; that virtue would have to die in order that the party might live; that the best men of the party for the time being would have to be offered up as a sacrifice, as a propitiation for the sins of the party. He was honest in his convictions. When he was pressed further to know how he could make a distinction between my colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and myself, and exonerate him from any blame and attach disgrace to me for my position, his very ready, philosophical, and sufficient reply was that I had not stood by the republican party, and the man that had not was not entitled to any pay of any kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to ask whether I am to understand him as saying that I had made that remark?

Mr. TIPTON. No, sir; I referred to an editor in my State.

Mr. MORTON. So I thought; but others around me understood the Senator as saying that it was myself.

Mr. TIPTON. I say, then, Mr. President, that the attack upon the integrity of Congress did not arise, in my opinion, on account of the retroactive character of that law. Why? Because from the foundation of the Government to the present time every law on the subject of congressional salary had been retroactive in its effect. The people who sent us here, sent us here with the way marked during the last seventy-five years by retroactive laws upon the subject of the pay of members of Congress. They have never before joined in one universal clamor in regard to the action of a party on a question of this character. Am I to come to the conclusion, then—can any of you force me to it ultimately—that the people went back upon all their precedents and all their conduct towards their public servants heretofore? Not a bit of it.

I say, therefore, unhesitatingly and positively, that the attack upon the integrity of Congress, and that appellation toward the majority and toward the Congress in question of being public thieves and plunderers of the Treasury, coming from democratic papers, coming from republican papers, coming from liberal-republican papers, was not made on account of the retroactive character of that law, and I offer as my reason for my belief that heretofore the people of this country had honored the men, without distinction of party, who had always cast such votes and had always taken the back pay, as it is now in derision termed. What had been the fact in regard to the present Vice-President of the United States? Did any man ever dare before last spring to charge him with being a "salary-grabber" and "back-pay plunderer?" Never; and yet it is upon the record that in 1856 his extra pay, as I call it, amounted to $2,178. Time rolled on, and in 1866 again he received back pay under another act amounting to $2,805; and with the back pay of those two laws, amounting to $5,000, in his pockets, he was triumphantly elected the Vice-President of the United States.

How has it fared with other gentlemen? Have the people of Ohio attempted at any time to drive from his seat in the Senate of the United States the gentleman who has just addressed the Senate, [Mr. SHERMAN,] because in 1866 he received back pay to the amount of $2,805? No; rather they have given him their confidence, and left the back pay attaching to his personal goods and chattels.

How has it fared with other gentlemen on the floor of the Senate? How is it with the honorable Senator from Rhode Island nearest to me, [Mr. ANTHONY?] In 1866 he received $2,805 back pay, and he has received the constant, unfaltering affection and sustaining influence of his constituency.

How has it been with the honorable Senator from Michigan? "Z. CHANDLER"—so says the document before me—"received $2,805 back pay in 1866," and instead of being denounced and stigmatized for having in his possession back pay, he has received the appellation of the "War Senator of the United States."

How has it fared with other gentlemen on this floor? How has it fared with gentlemen who held positions here and have gone back to their constituents? Where, sir, is Hendricks of Indiana, once on this floor, receiving back pay to the amount of $2,805 under one single act? He is to-day the proud and honored executive of the great State of Indiana.

Go to the Cabinet of the President. Is there anybody there who has not pocketed just what went into our pockets under this act of March last? How is it with the Postmaster-General? The Postmaster-General in 1866 received $2,805 back pay as a Senator, and from that time to this the State of Maryland has been honoring him, or he has been reflecting honor on the State of Maryland.

How is it, also, with the Attorney-General? The Attorney-General of the United States, standing to-day on the very threshold of the highest judicial tribunal known to our institutions, has in his vest pocket $2,805 back pay received by him as a Senator under the act of 1866.

How is it with the Secretary of State—a man certainly who has carried himself so well in his high office that the country is full of commendations on the subject of his fidelity and executive ability? He received $2,237 back pay in 1856, when he was a member of this body.

I say, therefore, I cannot for one moment believe that it is owing to the retroactive feature of that law that the members of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives have been stigmatized and flagrantly anathematized for passing it or receiving their legal, honest pay under it. You have to find some other explanation of it; and I shall find it for you before I take my seat. There is some other cause. You cannot attribute it to the fact that the people were sensitive on account of the financial condition of the country, because in 1866, at the time that act was passed, the people of the country were laboring under more of a war debt than they are at the present time. They were also laboring under taxes, many of which have since been removed. Their debt now is not what it was then. Their taxes are not what they were then. They did not then revolt, or many vacant seats would be here in the Senate to-day or filled by others than their present occupants, for many of those of us who were here then also participated in the passage of that act and the results flowing from it. The financial condition of the country at the present time is far better than in 1866, when the other law was passed, and no clamor was raised.

I say in the first instance the people were deceived by a false clamor. They did not understand that in the enactment of this law the whole franking privilege was stricken down. They did not understand at first in the enactment of this law that the question of mileage, which was so unequal, was corrected. They did not understand at first that under this law all these inequalities had been remedied. That is one reason why their minds were corrupted in regard to this question before the facts and true condition of the matter were presented to them.

Then the case was prejudiced again by the conduct of those Senators who commenced to return to the Treasury their pay resulting from the increase under that law. The very moment that they approached a Senator and charged him with having performed a corrupt act, and denounced the law and asked him if he was about to take the result of that corruption and he returned his extra pay to the Treasury of the United States, then came, as they thought, presumptive evidence of his own conscience having troubled him, and consequently that a great wrong had been perpetrated. They were deceived, and he left them deceived.

Almost the first man that presented himself on that subject was our honored Vice-President. Under the pressure and the clamor he returned $4,448. Then, as a matter of course, they would go to the honorable Senator from Indiana and say, "Now, sir, your chief, the Vice-President of the United States, has made a clean breast of it; he has returned to the Treasury $4,448; he did it on his conscience; he felt that a wrong had been perpetrated; and as he expected and desired happiness hereafter, he felt that he would not be entitled to it if he went into heaven with this amount of blood-money upon his skirts. Now, if you have drawn yours, will you not return it also?" That is the manner in which the appeal was made. Poor fool was he who made the appeal. Did he know that our Vice-President had never given it back as a matter of conscience at all; that he smiled at the idea of conscience, because he happened to have in one vest pocket $2,178 of back pay under the law of 1856 and $2,800 under the law of 1866? He retained $5,000 and returned $4,000; and yet it answered; it was the vindication; it was the tub thrown to the whale; it was the easy purchase of popularity, which the people said would accrue if he would please set the example just this once. "Please fork over now, under the charge of 'salary-grabber' and 'back-pay stealer;' please disgorge." And when it was done to the extent of one-third of it, they said, "That will answer, that will give us the opportunity of going at the rest of the Senators." And they went at you, and Senator after Senator walked up and said, "Present your contribution-box," and deposited his pay. But I have not noticed that any one of the Senators who had received back pay under the previous laws, and who have it to-day, returned anything but only just enough to appease the clamor of the hour. Therefore there was no conscience in it, and not one of them intended to admit that he had done a wrong in the past, or that his colleagues had done a wrong; but so the changes were rung on the subject; so it went over the whole country.

Now, if the people had not been misled in this matter, what might they legitimately have done? They might have legitimately done what I will state, and they could do nothing else. The honorable Senator from Iowa, I take it for granted, voted for the bill. He shakes his head. His memory may be at fault. I shall not stand corrected. of course, unless I have a more emphatical disclaimer, because I know he generally stands by his brethren in this hall.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Nebraska certainly cannot be mistaken; he must remember that he almost took me from the floor last session when I pronounced against the bill, and worked against it from first to last.

Mr. TIPTON. What causes me, then, to have an oblivious condition of mind on this subject results from the fact that during all the campaign I understood by the public press—and the public press must be respected—that the Senator from Iowa was making an atonement for the past, and would come here in hot haste and get here about twenty-four hours probably before the Senate would convene, in order to get in first a bill on this subject to put him right before the country. I thought probably, therefore, that he had something to atone for as he was in such hot haste; and I should not be astonished, from the manner in which his bill came here, if he had privately suggested to the Chaplain of the Senate to be as brief as possible for fear somebody else would cut under him and get another bill in first.

Now, if I am doing him injustice he will bear it like a martyr, in order that justice may be done members of the other House. I do not speak of them in their capacity here as the House of Representatives, but as canvassing on the stump at home, and many of them, going to the people, absolutely said, "Will you not please instruct me when I go back to present a resolution and urge the repeal of this law? I do not like to do it. So many honorable and honest and clever men around me voted for it that it would look like an attack on them indirectly; but if you put me under obligations to do it by instructions, they will all receive it, because we must obey instructions." And that seemed to be the object of the mission of some of these gentlemen over the country. It did not win in the State of Ohio, however. A desire was made known there, I think, to sacrifice the men of the House of Representatives who had voted for and received the back pay, but those men happened to have constituents enough that said, "Well, if they are to die on account of this, we have never lost confidence in them, and we will be at the funeral." And they were at the funeral, and some of the services were performed by the Senator from Ohio over the way, [Mr. THURMAN,] I understand, and the residue of the services are to be consummated on the 12th day of the present January.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that if the people had not been misled they might have done one thing; they might have said this frankly, and been respectable in saying it: "Gentlemen, you have followed the precedents that we have set for seventy-five years; we have no fault to find with you for having stood by the precedents of your Government; but hereafter we would prefer that a new precedent should be established on the subject." Under those circumstances we could have met them and discussed calmly and dispassionately and cleverly with them the propriety of a new precedent; but when for the first time in seventy-five years men approached us and denounced us for having performed an act of infamy, when we can retort upon them, "Your precedents were our guide," they ought to have observed a different course, and would have observed a different course had they not been misled in the first instance. Many men were evidently afraid to meet the issue or they would not stand up distinctly and defend the position they had taken. Defend it! It needed no defense. The facts of the history of the legislation of this country were its sufficient vindication.

Now, why were the people of that time liable to be thus deceived, and why were they liable to be thus imposed upon? That is a question of some importance. I will tell you what I understood about it. The disclosures that were made last winter about the Credit Mobilier—it seems to me I heard that phrase from the other side of the Senate yesterday—were so damaging (without my uttering one single sentiment, or giving one opinion in regard to what I think on that subject) that the republican party of the country were scandalized by those disclosures. If half was true that they heard, if half was true that was sworn to and furnished to the country in the reports, they felt that they could no longer stand by party under all circumstances in that condition. Therefore, after the charges had been made, and the evidence had been presented in one or two years gone by, of an extravagant use of the public funds; after the charges had been made of corruption among the highest officials of the Government; after the evidence in the Credit Mobilier investigation had gone forth, the people were ready to receive anything that slander might dictate, or that a mistaken fancy might furnish them.

They did receive it, and they allowed, during the excitement of the hour, a degree of opprobrium to attach to the names of as honest men as ever sat in the halls of legislation, for there are such in the Senate of the United States; and there is where you have suffered here, brother Senators; there is where the error has commenced. But it cannot be reversed or redeemed by any—I was about to say—clap-trap legislation, but I cannot get the privilege to say that here. I will do it out of doors. You cannot reverse it. The history of the last year politically shows that it is utter folly to come down here on the dust of this carpet for the purpose of undoing that which is irrevocable as the fiat of doom. Go with your new legislation to the State of Wisconsin, and build up the broken, waste places of your political Zion there. You cannot do it. Go with it to Kansas. Go with it to Illinois.

You talk about there being dissatisfaction with certain species of legislation. That was not the cause of it. It was the lost confidence of the republicans of the country in the Administration at Washington. Thousands and thousands of them never would have touched the grange movement in the world but that they wanted a reasonable pretext to get away from your rule and authority and not go into the democratic party. They therefore went into that movement because confidence was lost. Confidence cannot be restored by coming here in hot haste for the purpose of buying back a position in the affection of the people of this country. This is what two-thirds of this means, and the people know it.

I might also refer to the condition of things in the State of New York in the fall campaign. I produce that by way of addendum. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I believed at the time the law of March last was passed that the salary it fixed was not too large. I voted for it; I shall vote against all amendments, and especially, most heartily, against the amendment of the honorable Senator from Indiana. If his popularity in the State of Indiana bears any comparison to the magnitude and magnificence of his physical contour he needs no such species of legislation as this to hold him in the cords of affection of the people of Indiana; but if there is a standard that is to regulate prices in Congress for members from Indiana, I beg him to recollect that though he is here the concentrated and embodied manifestation of health, perhaps a less salary than would answer for ordinary men might attach to the remains of any citizen of Indiana that has escaped, or been left, from the ravages of the ague. [Laughter.] But I would not have him compare men and salaries and thus undertake to legislate for New England, the North, or the great West, including the principal part of the State of California.

The Senator from Ohio, in the introduction of his remarks, seemed to feel a little anxious that we should not undertake to interfere with the work of the committee. Well, so far as the work of the committee is concerned, while I cannot vote for it, I shall not say much in regard to it; but I do feel that the time of Senators is their own, notwithstanding the labors—and the successful and valuable labors—of committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President I regret now, as I did then, that the law regulating the compensation of Senators and Members of Congress was changed in the manner it was at the last session. I warmly approved the increase in the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and only regretted the salaries of other judicial officers, equally meritorious, were not also advanced. I am convinced that it is for the interest of the public service that judicial salaries in the United States should be upon a higher grade than they yet have reached. There have been many causes for this opinion, and I may mention one reason which affects not only judicial salaries, but all others of public officers. The country must expect that the compensation of its public servants shall be affected by its general financial condition; and the unhappy introduction, by those in charge of the Government, of the use of an irredeemable paper currency, has so affected the cost of all living, has advanced and unsettled all trade, has brought with it so much demoralization in public and in private life, so much of inflation and speculation, that it is not rational or true to say that salaries which were proper upon the basis of a constitutional currency, of gold and silver, can be properly rated when paid in depreciated paper.

This poison which has been injected into the veins of our entire financial system by the introduction of irredeemable paper currency as money remains, to injure public service and public morals, and it has unquestionably diminished the power of men to live as comfortably upon the same pay as they could have done had this vicious change to paper money not have taken place.

I may say also that I approved then, as now, the increase in the presidential pay and that of the Vice-President, as well as that of members of the Cabinet. The question of congressional pay is one not of amount merely, but largely of public policy. It is not to be gauged by the requirements of a single officer, but it is one that affects the policy of a representative government in the most radical degree. The Constitution of the United States provides that members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives "shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States." This was not the case in that government from which our institutions were chiefly derived, because in the government of Great Britain members of Parliament, of either house, receive no pay whatever. That was a country of privileged classes, a country of established ranks. This was not to be so here. That was a country of ancient and accumulated wealth; this was a country struggling through suffering and poverty into existence among the family of nations—to be sustained with the simplicity of republican governments; and it was to enable any man, no matter what his pecuniary condition, to serve his country as a representative in either branch of Congress, that the Constitution of the United States, departing from the rule in England, provided that he should "receive a compensation" to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, so broad is this question, that I doubt very much whether a more far-reaching and radical change could be made in the whole structure and practical working of the government of Great Britain than to provide pay for members of Parliament. It would open those two houses to classes of men in that country who are at present excluded, simply because they cannot stay there without pecuniary compensation; and yet no law being made for their compensation, they are practically excluded by the result of such an arrangement. If any working-man, so called, should happen to be returned to Parliament, he would have to be maintained while there by the voluntary subscription of his constituents.

I will not say what a change would be equally created in the Government of this country were Congress to disregard either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, and decide that Senators and Representatives should not receive compensation. The word is not mere "pay;" it is "compensation," an equivalent for the services they are expected to render to the public. But should it be decided that the pay here should be merely nominal; should it be brought down to the pay of the day-laborer, and therefore totally insufficient to support men who are called upon to perform a class of duties and to meet expenses far beyond the imagination of day-laborers—what, I ask, would be the result to the American people? The Houses of Congress would be filled by men drawn from two classes—the merely rich, who would come here as a pleasant occupation, giving the influence and power to mould legislation in their own interests, to whom pay was a question of no moment at all, and the destinies and the control of the legislation of the country would pass into the hands of him who had the longest purse, without regard to his mental or moral qualities or efficiency as a representative; or there would be another class, even more dangerous, the greedy, needy, characterless adventurer, who would come here to grow rich by the result of his public action. Sir, there are many such—the lobbies of Congress are full of them. The people of this country know that if seats in Congress can be controlled by candidates outbidding each other in the cheapness, as to money, for which they shall give their valuable presence in these Halls, you not only will have no "compensation ascertained by law," but you will have men quite ready to pay a bonus into the Treasury for the privilege of coming here. There will be a premium upon seats in Congress; but at what a cost to public morals and to the real interests of the people! The men who come here poor would not remain poor long, and the history of their legislation would contain the bankruptcy and disgrace of the Government and impoverishment of the people. It would be absurd, therefore, to pass measures which would fill seats in Congress with either of the two classes to which I have referred.

Now, Mr. President, there has been so much misrepresentation and abuse of the public mind as to the law passed at midnight on Monday, the 3d of March last, the general appropriation bill, the largest known to the Congress in amount, the most multifarious in its subjects, in which was contained the provision changing the salaries of Senators and Members of Congress; it has been subjected to so much wild, ignorant, coarse abuse, that it will require care for any one to discuss it and not be moved to some degree of indignation by the coarseness of the epithets which have been heaped upon the whole Congress indiscriminately.

I hope that I have a proper respect for a just public opinion, that I recognize fully my position, and my duty as a representative to obey a deliberate and just public opinion; in other words, that I should be a representative and not a misrepresentative. I shall make no boast of my independence of popular opinion—my actions must measure that—but I can only promise that my true opinions shall be always openly expressed in relation to public measures, and when that ceases my presence here shall also cease. In an effort now to enlighten public opinion I trust I shall not be found wanting; and it is with the intent to contribute to the truth of history in regard to the effect and meaning of the law changing the salaries, in regard to the policy of the present measure of repeal and amendment, that I desire to say what I do now.

The question of increased pay and of change in the basis of pay had been mooted frequently in other Congresses immediately preceding the last. There had always been an objection in some quarters to the allowance of mileage, which, in fact, created a great inequality in pay between members of Congress. Several times it had been proposed to do away with the system of mileage, and as often the effort had been unsuccessful. An attempt was finally made to increase the compensation, I think two or three weeks before the adjournment in March last. It failed. It was voted down, and I think I speak but the common opinion of all men in this body when I say that no one suspected, at the time that it was resuscitated and sprung in upon this bill of general appropriation, that such action would be permitted by the majority to take place. It came upon us suddenly; it came upon us improperly; it came upon us when there was not time, owing to the date of its introduction, for its proper consideration and debate, and it found the Senate fettered by a rule adopted in respect to the debate upon appropriation bills, by which not more than five minutes were given to any Senator for the discussion of any feature in an appropriation bill or any amendment thereto. It was most unfortunate and most discreditable to the parties by whom it was engineered and to that majority which permitted such a trick to be successful; but such was the history of its introduction into this body.

It was proposed by the measure that came from the House that an equal pay of $6,500 per annum should be given to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate. What was the effect of that? It was to reduce the pay of nearly every member of this body from the more distant States. To that I desired then, as I do now, to express my dissent. I am not willing to see the pay in 1874 put at a less rate than it was in 1866. I may say that that change would have benefited me. My pay, with mileage, was a little over $5,000 a year. My home is not very distant. I have neither much expense nor annoyance in reaching it, which I do with convenience and frequency. My case was very different from that of gentlemen who come here from a great distance, abandoning their professions, cutting themselves off altogether from the possibility of giving attention to their private affairs at home. I therefore should have been, and am now, adverse to seeing any reduction in the emolument of Senators and Members of the House who come from the distant States.

Then the other question arose: If you will not reduce the pay of those gentlemen from the distant States, will you not equalize the compensation by increasing the pay of all others to the maximum of the pay and mileage of those from the more distant States? It was a question, therefore, of equalization of compensation, that the members from the New England States and the Atlantic coast should receive the same pay as was then allowed by law to gentlemen from the more distant States. To men from Nebraska, from Nevada, from Oregon, from California there was no increase of compensation worthy of the name—a most trival sum, amounting in some cases to little or nothing, and in one case absolutely compelling a Senator from Oregon, in order to equalize his compensation so that he should not receive more than $7,500 for the Forty-second Congress, to return to the Treasury the sum of nearly $1,500, his pay and mileage under the law of 1866 amounting to nearly $9,000 per annum. I do not think these facts have been fully considered by those who have indulged in such unhesitating denunciation, accusing the whole Senate, the whole House, of having "grabbed"—I think that is the favorite word—$5,000 each in money. Such a charge is not true in fact, nor in any way justified by the facts.

The pay-bill of March, 1873, did not increase the salary of one-third of the Senate to an amount worthy of notice. It did advance the salaries of the other two-thirds so as to make them about equal to the average of the pay and mileage of the first third of whom I have spoken. This is the fact. For instance, my pay by the law of March, 1873, was increased some $4,800 and upward, whereas the gentleman who then sat next me, my friend from California, (Mr. Casserly,) received an increase of about $800—$400 a year advance to him, and $2,400 and odd to me.

As I said before, there had been frequent objections to the allowance of mileage, and this was a proposition to abolish the mileage system, and to level up, and not to level down, the average compensation. It was a proposition to equalize, which has been wrongly construed to be a general increase of $2,500 per annum in all cases. I think I have shown that it was neither one nor the other; that it was, in a great measure, an equalization without increase of pay. It was, perhaps, in a still greater measure as to numbers an increase of compensation. To nearly one-third of both Houses of Congress, as I have said, the advance was immaterial—very slight indeed; and I have stated one case in which it created a very large reduction of compensation.

I have stated the circumstances under which the bill came here on Saturday night, March 2, and its reference to a committee of conference, compelling the session of the committee of conference on Sunday, the report of the bill on Monday near midnight, the adjournment of the Congress being fixed at twelve o'clock on the day following. Sir, it is a misfortune in our legislation on these large appropriation bills that at such a time, confused by the rush and pressure of business, overworked and fagged out as members are on such occasions so near the adjournment of Congress, opportunity for examination and discussion is not allowed, and you must frequently vote to defeat the whole bill, no matter how essential or meritorious may be the general character of its provisions, in order to object to a single vicious feature. On Monday night, when the report of the joint committee of conference was presented to the Senate—and I think it was toward midnight—the alternative was forced upon every Senator either to have a new session of Congress called by the President, or to let that bill pass with all its imperfections upon its head, with all its objectionable features. You had the option, sir, and I had it, by my vote, either to signify my preference for a new session of Congress to be called in April, or allow that appropriation bill to become the law. I chose to vote for this general appropriation bill; and, looking at events as they have since transpired by the light of my present judgment, I approve to-day my vote of last March, believing the public interest to have been largely advanced by the non-assembling of Congress in April last—not alone because of its large pecuniary cost, but chiefly that the country was saved for a time at least from much vicious and injurious legislation.

Now, Mr. President, as to this question of compensation—this question of equivalent to members here for their services to the public. Reasonably speaking, a compensation, from the meaning of the word itself, should be sufficient, for that which is insufficient is no compensation. "The laborer is worthy of his hire." He is to be compensated. And then comes the difficulty of ascertaining what a just compensation is; still more so when, by the provisions of the Constitution, we are placed in the very delicate situation of fixing it ourselves.

In the course of my professional life I have served men to a greater or less extent, and by the results of my labors I have made my support; but there never has been a case of importance in which I would not gladly have referred the question of my professional compensation to some disinterested competent person. And to-day, if it were possible for me to delegate this power and duty to somebody else, I should be most willing. But that is not the law; and it is our duty to fix this compensation ourselves.

Mr. President, in my opinion one of the chief dangers of our day and country is the devotion of citizens to their private pursuits, to the neglect of their public duties. If this Federal Constitution shall go down, if this experiment for human self-government shall fail, there will be few more to blame than those intelligent men who have grown rich in their private pursuits and allowed places of high public trust and honor to be filled by men less worthy and able than themselves, but who were willing at least to give their time to public service. Who does not know of the frequent advice to young men of talent and character: "Keep out of politics; stick to your business, to your profession, to your ledger, to your office, to your studio; keep out of politics?" This is the common cry which is accepted as wise, as just, as commendable, in a country which must depend for the elevation and the continuance of its government upon the best efforts of its most intelligent, its most able, its most conscientious men.

What is the consequence of all this un-American, worldly-wise advice to the youth of our country, too often followed by them? They have sought to make the name of politician discreditable. They have sought to make attention to public duties suspicious. And what has been the result, Senators? Has it not been a lower tone of public service? Has it not been a degraded tone of public service? I say that to a certain degree it has; for I believe if there should be an increase in honorable competition between men of intellect and character for public position, it would tend largely to the elevation of the tone of our service and to the benefit of the whole country. This Government is not an automatic machine. It is not to run itself. It calls for the efforts constantly, and oftentimes the self-sacrificing efforts of the ablest and the purest and the bravest to guide it on in the right direction, and keep it in the paths of honor and safety.

Now, Senators, if a large pay would of itself secure really the best men, if it would really fill Congress with statesmen worthy of the name, what measure of economy would be so beneficent to the whole people? The benefit to the people of even one pure-minded, clear-headed, patriotic man in the Congress of the United States, in either House, is not to be weighed in money, and scarce any sum in reason but would wisely be paid if that alone would secure it. I do not say that it would; I do not believe that by money alone such things are to be accomplished. The thing is for us to consider upon a question so broad as this, what is the just medium that will tend to secure the presence here of proper men capable of rendering valuable service to the country. A proper, respectable maintenance ought to be secured; no more. The representatives should not be harassed and embarrassed by constant pecuniary needs. A man is not to come here to save or make money by his office and position; such a man is unfit for the place, and falls far below a proper comprehension of its duties and responsibility.

How can you fix any sum which shall be in every case just to the different members of a body so large and varied as this or the other House of Congress—so much depends upon the character of a man's culture, his tastes and education, as well as the scale of expenditure to which he has been accustomed, so much depends upon the expense which the presence of his family, large or small, throws upon him? There are single men in both Houses of Congress, men of small families, men of large families. The natural expenditures of these are so totally variant in degree that it is impossible to fix a sum that shall not be too small in one case and perhaps too large in another. You are not to discriminate between members as to their pay, which must be equal; each must have the same. An attempt at discrimination would not only be odious, inquisitorial, silly, but, worse than all, it would be in violation of the spirit and meaning of the constitutional compact under which we find ourselves in this Chamber as the representatives, each of sovereign States.

It is impossible, therefore, to state a sum which shall in one case be entirely adequate and reasonable, and yet when applied to a second case may not be found totally different. Perhaps as a matter of comparison it would not be improper for me to say that, being unwilling when I came to the Senate of the United States to separate myself from my family, I brought them to Washington, and that here I live much as I live in my home in Delaware; perhaps more expensively, but certainly less comfortably; and yet the pay that would be ample for a single man has been insufficient for my necessary expenses, surrounded as I am with the responsibilities of the education and maintenance of a large and growing family. Therefore I say, and without complaint, that the pay that might be ample for my neighbor would be insufficient for me; so that much more of my private money has been paid to support me in this city than I ever have taken from the Treasury of the United States.

I refer to this fact with hesitation and only as a matter of illustration. It is always optional for me, if I cannot in justice to myself remain here living on such a scale as I consider right and proper, to resign my place and go home. This is a privilege always open to me. It is one that I may take advantage of when I see fit, and until I do so I make no complaint whatever that my compensation has not been larger than it has been. All that I would ask is that it be equal to that of those around me.

But, Mr. President, I have not proposed to fix a sum. I found one ascertained by law when I came here. I knew what it was before I came. I never personally desired and never should have moved to increase it. I shall not move to decrease it, and I shall not permit, if my vote can prevent it, the salary and emoluments of any other Senator to be decreased from what they were when he and I entered the public service. If there be an advantage from mileage, which does not inure to my personal benefit, I propose that the recipients shall still retain it.

But, sir, the country is poor; the country is in great pecuniary distress; it has a heavy debt under which its interests and its people are staggering; its burdens are, in my opinion, very illy and unfairly adjusted. Our people in every section are the victims of an illy-contrived and dangerous system of finance, which has made panics inevitable, and by placing the entire banking system under the control of the central government, excludes the possibility of remedies which intelligent local self-government might, and in my belief would, suggest. To attempt relief is a present duty, and steps should at once be taken to do what can be done to mitigate this wide-spread distress. The first is a rigid economy in Government expenditures so far as is consistent with public interest. There is a just and righteous popular demand on this subject that should be respected, and I propose, so far as my votes here can, to respond to it. Let, then, economy begin here; let us replace the scale of our compensation to the point where it stood on the morning of the 3d of March, 1873. I simply desire to repeal the salary act of March 3, 1873, from this date. This I shall vote for. Certainly I shall not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, which proposes that the increased pay, beginning on the 4th of March, 1873, and continued to the present time, shall be recovered by charging its excess over the rate of $5,000 a year against Senators hereafter, until the amount they shall have received in the Forty-third Congress shall be equal to $5,000 a year, including the difference between $5,000 and $7,500, which has been paid from March 4th up to the present time.

My objections to that are twofold. In the first place it is entirely impracticable. In the next place I believe it to be unconstitutional. There is no such thing as lawful compulsion to pay back either the retroactive pay given by the act of March 3, 1873, or the prospective pay from and after that day. When the pay of members of Congress was ascertained by law it became their legal right to take that money. It was a vested right. It cannot be divested by any subsequent legislation. It was as much their money in law, was as liable to their debts, would have descended according to the intestate laws of their domicile, or could have been controlled by their last wills, as much as any other property which they possessed otherwise than by derivation from the Treasury of the United States. There can be no valid law compelling the restoration of pay which has been fixed by an act of Congress. The most you can do is to stop it by repealing the law and changing the rate. Your law in that respect cannot be retrospective; I deny that it can be retroactive.

But while there is no compulsion on this subject, there is a voluntary right which rests with every individual to decide for himself. If from any reason he should feel that he ought not to retain the increase of pay made retroactive by the law of March 3, 1873, or if he thinks that he ought now, upon the repeal of that law, to pay back into the Treasury the difference between $5,000 and $7,500 as paid since March 4, 1873, there is nothing on earth to prevent him. The way is open and easy. If from any motive, high or low, of high sense of conscientious duty, or the poor, low sense of meeting a temporary cry for popular favor, or whatever may be his motive, still his power of action is the same. There is nothing to prevent his not only giving his back pay, but he may give his future pay, he may give all his pay, and he may devote his entire private fortune, if he thinks that will make him a happier or better man or advance his political prospects with a sensible people. That is for his private judgment. He must act upon it as he sees fit. But you cannot take that money from him involuntarily. You cannot do so by a retroactive law, and compel him to give up money which has by law been ascertained to be his. It having been so ascertained, you cannot declare it not to be his.

Why, sir, the effect of this would be to insist that Senators and Members who have drawn salary at the rate of $625 a month since last March, shall only receive $200 a month in future until equalization had been forced. Such a law would impose gross inequality in future pay, and I cannot imagine a more utterly dangerous precedent than to allow the Congress of the United States, or any majority of Congress, to declare that the pay of members of this body shall be unequal. Why, let me illustrate. The seat upon my left was the seat of a Senator from California, (Mr. Casserly,) than whom no more devoted public servant was in public life, whose absence subtracts from this Chamber and from the councils of this nation as much of pure, high character, culture, and ability as would the absence of any other man now upon the floor of either House of Congress. Compelled by ill health, caused by over-devotion to the public service, he resigned his place as Senator on the first day of the present session. Now, I do not know whether that gentleman drew his pay up to the first of December. We shall presently have an honorable successor to him in our midst. When that gentleman comes, what shall be his compensation? Shall it be fixed by law according to the Constitution, or shall it be fixed by the action of his predecessor, over whom he can have no control? Should Mr. Casserly not have drawn all his money, will Judge Hager, his successor, have a salary equal to $5,000 a year? Or should Mr. Casserly have drawn his money, shall that draft be charged to Judge Hager, and he be compelled to live in Washington on half the pay that all the rest of us may receive? Is it not impracticable? Is it not unjust? Is it not absurd? Is it not unconstitutional? Can you admit that, either for a month or a year or a session, a majority of the Senate shall say that between members of this body there shall be unequal pay? No, sir, there could not be a more dangerous admission, there could not be a power more fatal in its results, if it were carried out as partisans oftentimes will exert power. You could destroy the practical representation of a State here by refusing to compensate the men who come here as her representatives; for that would be the necessary result of admitting such a principle as is contained in the proposition of the Senator from Indiana.

The perfect equality of the States as States in this body in all respects—in numbers, in votes, and in all that goes to sustain them in numbers and votes—is a fact fixed by the Constitution, which cannot be destroyed by the votes of all the other States if one alone should object to it. No State shall, without its consent, by any amendment to the Constitution, be deprived of her equal suffrage in the Senate. And when you say that, you say this also, that when they are here, they are to come here in all respects on an equality with all the others; and therefore I insist that by the very federal nature of our Government, by the necessary intendment of the language of the Constitution, it would be totally without the power of Congress to say that some members of the Senate should receive one compensation and others a less sum. I trust that the Senate will under no circumstances ever permit such an attempt at discrimination to receive their assent.

Why, sir, it would be almost endless to picture the results of such a doctrine. A dominant and fierce majority might declare that so long as the political sentiment of a State was expressed in opposition to their wishes the pay of her Senators should be lowered to a mere pittance; and that when the State recanted her heresies, improved in virtue, and came to their way of thinking, then the pay should be increased to the higher level of those who were in accord with the sentiments of the majority.

Mr. President, this is all I have to say about this bill. The subject is not pleasant. It has been rendered especially unpleasant by the manner of its introduction and discussion, in and outside of Congress. Charges, gross and unhesitating, have been made against men who simply differ in opinion on this subject. I believe as pure men as this body contains, or ever did contain, considered that it was for the public interest that the pay should be increased, and that it should be paid retroactively; and yet I did not agree with them as to the retroactive feature. Had it been in my power it never would have become the law. It brought to me personal gain, and I exercised my personal discretion and my personal privilege, without regard to any dictation, to do what I thought right with the money. My hesitancy in refusing to retain that money chiefly arose from the fact that I might by any implication be held to reflect upon those of my fellow-Senators who differed from me. That was my chief objection to it; but, nevertheless, I followed my own opinion and my own conscience, and did not retain the money, but paid it back into the Treasury of the United States.

I do not believe that if this question were understood by the people of the country there would be much, if any, objection to the equalization of salaries, so that those of us who live on the Atlantic coast should receive as much as those from a greater distance. The question as to what forms a proper compensation is a very broad one, and I do not care to pursue it further at the present time.

I believe I have said all I wanted to say on that subject, and I shall simply repeat that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Indiana on the grounds that I have stated—that it is an utterly impracticable amendment, and it is forbidden by the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution. I shall vote for the repeal of the law of the 3d of March, 1873, so that the pay of Congress and the emolument of its members shall stand as they had been ascertained before I came into Congress and at the time of my entrance into this body. I believe that will be best reached by a simple clause of repeal of the act. I shall oppose the reduction of the salary of the Cabinet officers. I am called upon to express my opinion to my constituents whether the sum of $10,000, which the law at present gives to a Cabinet officer, is in excess of propriety and reason or not. I answer that it is not. I know that it is not, as I have been in Washington long enough to know the nature of the requirements made officially and socially upon them and their families.

Another thing, Mr. President. This bill also contains a clause repealing our action of last March in regard to the officers and employés of either House of Congress. I object to that. I am quite willing to go back to what my salary was when I came into the Senate, and I do not want any other man's diminished because he had certain mileage privileges which I had not. If they are diminished it will be against my vote; but in fixing the pay of the officers and the employés of each House of Congress I am not disposed to think there was any error in the action of Congress last year. I hope they will not be reduced. I do not think they are excessive. And, therefore, before the vote is taken finally on this bill, I shall move to amend it in two particulars. I shall move to strike out that clause which proposes to restore the rate of compensation of the officers and employés of either House to what it was in March, 1873; and I shall also move to strike out the second section, which reduces the pay of the heads of Departments.

I am perfectly aware that there is a great deal more that is important in this subject of compensation for public service. Certain it is that I am not in favor of illegitimate appropriations for expenditures; and as I am opposed to illegitimate expenditure, I wish to prevent that by a reasonable, legitimate appropriation. You have seen already how a habit has grown into the Executive Departments of allowances of a questionable nature for those conveniences which are essential to the prompt transaction of public business, and scandal has been created by it; but I think the best way to avoid these things is to make a reasonable appropriation, that shall not drive officials, high or low, into illegitimate methods of eking out an insufficient income.

Mr. President, I think it of the last importance to the people of this country that they should have confidence in the integrity, the home-bred pecuniary honesty, of their representatives and of their rulers. It is the duty of every man to do what he can to establish that. It is his duty equally, in establishing confidence, to strike down in any place, high or low, dishonesty and peculation in officials. I rejoice, sir, that the public eye is turned in such criticism. It has not turned too soon; it cannot be turned too often or too closely; and I hope the day will come when any public official of the United States who is found engaging, directly or indirectly, in abuses of the privileges of his office by small peculations, by indirect and illegitimate gains, will be rebuked by a wholesome public sentiment of the country, and that no man in office will be found to sustain such conduct. And it is from high officials that the example can come with best effect, and the public service surely needs it.

Sir, I hope that public attention and displeasure have been aroused. I hope they will not slumber until these abuses shall have been remedied. But, depend upon it, the people, who from a sense of honesty demand these reforms, are too just to ask for a sacrifice that is unnatural, and which cannot be performed except at a loss to the public service.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] made some allusion to a speech that I made in Ohio last summer during the canvass. The Senator, I am sure, did not intend to convey the idea that I had assailed my colleagues in this House who had voted for this bill or who had taken the back pay. I propose to read a brief extract from my speech upon that occasion, and that is all that I have to say upon this bill. It is the speech that I made at Athens, Ohio, in the month of August. Speaking on this subject I said:

> It might be the subject of comment if I failed to make some reference to what is called the "back pay." By an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill the salary of members of Congress was raised to $7,500 a year, instead of $5,000, which was their compensation under the old law. What was known as congressional mileage was abolished, and all allowances for newspapers and stationery. The law was also made retroactive, so as to pay this increased rate for the Congress then expiring, deducting from it, however, all sums paid for mileage, stationery, and newspapers.
> The measure was in no sense a party one. So far as that is concerned, it may not be improper to observe that more democrats voted for it in the two Houses, in proportion to their numbers, than republicans. But it was in no sense a party measure.
> The actual increase of pay will vary with each member, depending upon his distance from Washington, and the amount of his correspondence and labor.
> It has been the general conviction of the members of the Senate, since I have been in that body, that the pay and allowances of members, all things considered, were too small, and that sound and enlightened policy dictated an increase.
>
> The Constitution has given to members of Congress the power to determine the measure of their own compensation. In this matter they are made their own judges. It is a delicate thing to give officers the power to determine and fix the value of their own services, but under our form of Government this power could be lodged nowhere else but in Congress. The pay of members of Congress has been increased on five different occasions, and on every occasion the increased pay has been dated back to the beginning of the Congress in which it was made. The last time before the present was in 1866, and gave back pay for the period of eighteen months. The principle involved in the back pay is not different or worse now than it was the first time it was voted for and taken. It is the greatest injustice to say that the members of the Forty-second Congress who voted for back pay have been guilty of stealing or of intended fraud upon the Treasury. Those that have taken the money received it according to law—a law they had as much power to enact as any other. Many of those who voted for and received this back pay in the last Congress are among the best and ablest in the land of both parties, and believed they were but exercising a constitutional power, had earned the money, and were following an example that had been set by many of the most distinguished and patriotic men who had gone before them in the Halls of Congress.
> But while thus doing justice to the motives of the members of Congress who have voted for or received what is called "back pay," I do not wish to be understood as approving the principle involved in it. To me it appears to be a plain principle that the increase of salaries should be prospective only. Had the increase of the President's salary, or those of the judges of the Supreme Court, been made to reach back two or four years, all could see the danger of the principle. Yet there would be as much propriety and justice in giving back pay to the President, judges, and all other officers whose salaries have been too low, as to members of Congress. The only difference between the cases would be that the members of Congress have power to vote themselves back pay, and the others have not. When I rendered service during the Forty-second Congress I expected to receive only the compensation then fixed by law, and when that was paid to me I gave a receipt which I understood to be in full; and if I now receive a greater sum for that service, it seems to me that it would be in the nature of a gratuity; and this principle admitted in the general administration of the Government would be of a dangerous character. Where a salary, which has been definitely fixed by law, is increased, and such increase is made to extend back two years, it is hard to distinguish such back pay from a gift; and in this case it is regarded by the country as money paid without consideration, being given for services already paid for according to law.
> Judge PLANTS. It has been reported, Senator, that you have personally accepted the back pay. Will you explain?
> Governor NOYES. A note has been handed up from the crowd asking what he has done with his back pay. He feels a little delicate about answering, but I think we will press the question.
> Senator MORTON. Well, I can say, I have not taken it, and never expect to. Immediately after the passage of the bill I had an interview with my distinguished colleague, Mr. PRATT, of Indiana, and we then agreed that we would not take it, believing that the principle involved in back pay was not a sound one. And I desire expressly to say that while I entertained that view myself in regard to the principle of back pay, it is due to other members of Congress, who voted for and received it, to say that they thought they had a right to it; that what they did was sanctioned by precedent and by the votes and actions of many of the ablest men in the nation who have gone before them. It is a matter upon which men have a right to differ, and differ honestly. I have simply stated my convictions, while I want to do justice to their motives.

That was all I said upon the subject.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. President, being a member of the committee which had this bill under consideration, and differing to a very considerable degree from the conclusions of that committee, I desire to say a very few words upon it.

This is an important subject, and one that has almost always given concern and at times considerable trouble. It is a delicate subject, for it so nearly affects those who are dependent upon us for subsistence I may say, and many of whom are personally and favorably known to us, besides affecting ourselves so nearly by obliging us to be the judges of the compensation we ought to receive. Therefore I do not deprecate a fair, candid, and dispassionate discussion of it. Hasty and inconsiderate legislation upon this subject, especially in regard to our own salary, may cause more excitement and more trouble than almost any other subject, and for the simple reason that as there is no power to intervene between us and the people in taking from the Treasury what we please in compensation for our services, naturally and necessarily the attention of the people will be attracted to our conduct.

All the State constitutions, so far as I know, without an exception, fix the salary of members of the Legislature, and some of them, because of the shameful abuses perpetrated by some, fix the salary in most emphatic terms, so as to preclude, if possible, any kind of compensation beyond that fixed by the organic law.

But not so, Mr. President, with the Constitution of the United States. There is no limit to our power to take what we may. The Treasury is open to us, and any sum that we may deem satisfactory to ourselves we can take for our services. And therefore is it to be considered extraordinary by any reasonable man that the people should be particularly vigilant in observing our conduct in this respect? Their protection is our own sense of right, and if that fails, either by mistake or through perversity, their only hope rests in the power that may be manifested in the expression of a sentiment until they may correct the wrong by their action at the polls. The discussion of such subjects, which so much involve the selfishness of our nature, does good; it secures deliberation. In some respects it liberalizes, in others it justifies, and in others again it restrains; so that in the maturity of judgment a happy and a just medium is obtained satisfactory to the people, and at the same time compensatory to their representatives so far as positions of so high and honorable a character can be.

I was opposed, Mr. President, to the measure increasing salaries. I both spoke and voted against it, as you well know. I considered it hasty and improvident legislation, and so said, and nothing has happened since to change my views. There was no time for deliberation and no time for thought. In the confusion and excitement of the closing hours of the session it passed. That mistaken legislation has caused us much trouble, and no one regrets it more than I do. In speaking of trouble I do not allude to individuals, but to the country as a country, creating commotion, giving offense, stirring up dangerous clamor, giving excuses for criticism often unfair and cynical, inspiring the hopes and invigorating the efforts of demagogues. All over the country we witnessed a scene during the past summer and fall which I trust may never be repeated, and I fervently hope that upon no future occasion will any such opportunity be given for its repetition by any like inadvertent legislation.

I was opposed to the increase of salaries, and especially of our own, because I thought we had a salary which amounted to a reasonable compensation and with which the people were satisfied, and I thought it was impolitic and unwise, if for no other reason, to disturb the good feeling that then existed in this respect among the people for their representatives.

Mr. President, I am not indifferent to our common wants, nor do I fail in a general appreciation of our services, nor am I insensible to the attractions of money any more than anybody else; but I thought in all sincerity that the officers of the Government, the President of the United States and ourselves and others embraced in the measure for increasing salaries, were, under the old salaries, being fairly paid. They had all passed through an inflated currency when two dollars and more of paper would only get one of gold; and then when there was not near so much difference; when, too, every one, so far as I heard, on this floor was speaking and hoping for a specie basis—but, alas! how few, I fear, will answer for their hopes when the roll is called—under such circumstances it was proposed to increase the salary as these advantages increased.

Therefore, so believing, I am in favor of returning to the old law of compensation to all as it stood before the increase, so far as we can constitutionally do so, and shall support with great satisfaction the proposition that shall come nearest to the old law.

The Constitution provides that—

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected.

So thus having increased his compensation just before he was inaugurated, the President has the advantage of that part of the clause, and he has the advantage of the latter part of it in controlling our action during the period for which he was elected. While on account of this constitutional prohibition we cannot touch his salary during his term, we can now provide, as we ought to provide, for bringing it back to the old salary to commence at the expiration of his term.

Then, again, the Constitution provides that the—

> Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, * * * shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

So that in respect to the salaries of the judges we may be concluded in our action by this provision, and be unable to retrace our steps, at all events, without having on the bench judges at the same time drawing different salaries as compensation.

But beyond these two exceptional cases we can have an immediate repeal of all salaries that were increased.

I was earnest, extreme it may be said, in my opposition to this whole measure of increase of salaries in its entirety. I did not then, nor do I now, question the sincerity or the motives of the gentlemen who differed then and who still differ from me. Ascribing to others fair and just motives in their action, I would that equally fair and just motives may be ascribed to me. If I know myself, Mr. President, I do not think that I have either the nature or the aspirations of a demagogue; I heed no more the unfounded clamors of a multitude than I care for the criticisms and sneers of the few, where my convictions are involved. Those I will pursue. Not, let it be understood, however, that I am insensible to the influence of those around me any more than any other man, or that I will not observe the just demands of a fair sentiment though not agreeing with my own; but acting upon my matured convictions of right, I will discharge what I deem to be my duty.

Gentlemen who differ with me upon the subject of salary as a question of political economy may view it from a more elevated standpoint than I do; and they may be right and I may be wrong, but in neither event does it at all reflect upon the sincerity of any. I believe that I do differ with a majority of the Senate, nor do I know that I agree entirely with any one in this body upon the great subject of salaries.

I had my own views long before this recent clamor, and I do not know that I ever did vote for an increase of salary; if I did it must have been in a most exceptional case. They may be singular; but they are my own, and most conscientiously entertained.

I was opposed to what is commonly called the "back pay," and I was equally opposed to what in like language may be called the "front pay;" and I was opposed to the one as much as I was opposed to the other, and for the simple reason that both were an increase and nothing more, and which it is admitted Congress had the power to make, whether upon the last or first day of the session, or of the Congress itself, including all its sessions, with this difference, let it be observed: that for the future the pay of all Congresses, Presidents, Vice-Presidents, &c., was increased, while that of the past was but for the Congress in session at the time. The past took about $1,500,000; the future, unless changed, will take untold millions.

I believed that, beside the wrong involved in the increase, it was both unwise and impolitic to go back in changing our existing salary, although the uniform action of all preceding Congresses may justify it, for the reason that it may lead to such great abuses, and it presents to a retiring Congress such strong temptations to overrate their services or commit an actual wrong.

Mr. President, I have always feared the centralizing influences of the Federal Government. I have always looked with alarm upon the growing greatness and power and opulence of the Federal Government. It is becoming so overshadowing in all its influences that, unless checked, nothing can resist even its moral, much less its physical, power. States, like stars in the midday splendor of the sun, are lost to the gaze.

When we had a simple and rational Federal Government, conducted upon the simple and rational principle of attending to its own legitimate business, leaving to the people and the States to carry on their multiplied concerns; when simplicity and frugality prevailed here; when our fathers came here, penetrating the wilderness, traversing almost impassable roads, crossing swollen and unbridged rivers, enduring all kinds of hardships and at times incurring great dangers, to discharge their legislative duties at six dollars per day, and afterward at eight dollars per day; when we had no great, exhaustive military and naval establishments, no titled generals and admirals with immense salaries—then was our Federal Government administered with that respect to the States and people which the Constitution, as it was then understood, required. Then the Federal Government was poor and frugal, and offered nothing to ambition much beyond that of any of the States. Then the States were the idol of the people. All eyes were turned to them in case of trouble. In their legislative halls were assembled among the wisest and the purest of their statesmen. All great questions were there dicussed and amplified, and policies originated. Honors were regarded equal. There was in this respect no subordination of the State to the Federal Government.

Now how is it, Mr. President? Behold the change! All eyes are turned to this Capitol, and with more devotion than the sun-worshipers of the East! Here is where all come for honors, for emoluments, for office and pay. Here flows the stream at which all would quench their thirst for honor and emolument. Here are offices without number, salaries without stint. Here the President gets $50,000 a year; a governor of a State may get but $4,000 and less. Here a judge of the highest court gets $10,000; in the States probably $4,000 and less. Here a member of Congress gets at the rate of $14 per day for the whole year round; the member of the Legislature probably $5 and less, for it may be sixty or ninety days in most of the States; and all the other officers about in the same proportion. Everything is overshadowed by the powers and resources of the Federal Government. It is stretching out its arms and grasping the minutest powers of the States. There is hardly any subject that is now not being construed or claimed to be within its power; and for the reason that here selfishness has a wider field for its operations and unbounded resources for its prey. To the eyes of those who would have us a consolidated nation rather than a Federal Republic all this seems right; but to those, on the other hand, who would have this a government of limited and defined powers, absolutely indispensable to the existence of the federal objects and for the performance of its necessary and legitimate functions, and all the residue to be with the States and people, all this presents a gloomy picture.

I would therefore strip this Government of all that which would make it more attractive than any State governments. As it was established in necessity to conduct our general relations, I would in all things, as near as I could, restrict it to the objects that caused its establishment. I would make it poor and frugal. I would have its wants but few and its legislation simple, and literally no more than is required by the Constitution; and confined within it, how few and simple are its real duties, and how plain and practical ought its legislation to be! I would have no special attractions for members of Congress here, and short sessions, and that when done they would return to their homes and mingle with their constituents in the ordinary pursuits of life, so that they might not sink the duties and feelings of the citizen into the character of the professional politician. It is said, Mr. President, that talent cannot be commanded, especially in the service at Washington, unless it be well paid. This is a mistake. The history of our country illustrates the very reverse. Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, and a host of others not less distinguished for their ability and patriotism, but probably less known to fame, have given to us the brightest pages of American history for far less pay than we get.

The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says that the salaries were then paid in gold, and the purchasing power was so much greater. Then let us return to gold. Instead of being an argument with me for high salaries, it would be an argument for the present against it; for a settled policy of low or moderate salaries might possibly direct the attention of the office-holders of the country, now so largely engaged in attending to popular elections, to the science of political economy and the study of this question which so directly interests them, and bring to the aid of all those who believe in a gold and silver basis this powerful body, both in intelligence, talent, and numbers, in securing the resumption of specie payments.

I am not one of those who believe in paid talent for government. I am not one of those who are confounded with the mystery of government. If there be anything practical on earth it is government. The age and the people generally have the governments suited to both. If there be a plain and practical government on earth it is our own. Its duties and powers are few and simple, and so plainly defined by the Constitution that it does require a paid, a selfish, or a morbid genius to distort and pervert them.

I admit the power of genius, its exalted worth when properly directed; but how dangerous when misdirected! I confess that it does require talent, genius it may be, to undertake to make anything a legal tender for the payment of debts, from a coon-skin to the vignette of Stanton on a piece of green paper; to undertake to make a gold and silver currency by the successive issues of irredeemable paper money; to undertake to bank upon debts instead of upon capital; to undertake to cheapen articles by imposing tariffs and taxes upon them; to undertake to show that by going into debt we are getting rich; or, as in the case of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] elaborate the right of a colored gentleman, or a gentleman of color, just as etiquette may prescribe in designating those of our fellow-citizens, to be buried by his side in some cemetery organized by charter, or to occupy a part of his bed in some public inn, or the whole of it, if the arrangement should not suit the taste of the Senator, if there be no other in the inn; and at the same time, whilst suffering from all or any of these ills, make us believe that we are enjoying the highest blessings on earth. It requires genius to do this; plain, practical, good sense, with fair education and honest intentions, could never rise to these lofty heights. But in the plain, ordinary administration of our Government, confined strictly to its real duties, fair capacity, and above all honesty, will conduct is in safety.

There is not a being, however low, that has not given its lessons of wisdom, and especially in government, for all people have had some kind of government. Take, for example, the reflections of that small race of people, the people of Lilliput, upon government and its administration, and we, great, and large, and learned, may find something even there for consideration. "In choosing persons"—among these people it is said—"for all employments they have more regard to good morals than to great abilities; for since government is necessary to mankind they believe that the common size of human understanding is fitted to some station or other; and that Providence never intended to make the management of public affairs a mystery to be comprehended only by a few persons of sublime genius, of which there are seldom three born in an age; but they suppose truth, justice, temperance, and the like, to be in any man's power, the practice of which virtues, assisted by experience and a good intention, would qualify any man for the service of his country, except where a course of study is required. But they thought the want of moral virtues was so far from being supplied by superior endowments of the mind that employment could never be put into such dangerous hands as those of persons so qualified; and at least that the mistakes committed by ignorance in a virtuous disposition would never be of such fatal consequence to the public weal as the practice of a man whose inclinations led him to be corrupt, and who had great abilities to multiply and defend his corruptions." Though coming from a very inferior people, there are thoughts in this not to be despised by us, especially in this generation and at this time, when an idea prevails among many that ability and corruption are combined in the most gigantic enterprises, whether in legislation or in the ordinary transactions of men. The past year has been prolific in developments which go far to confirm this opinion—indeed, almost make it a fact in history.

It has required the practical legislation of England for the last ten years to undo what genius and ability did in legislating for the preceding six hundred years.

And so far as we ourselves are concerned, it will take years of patient and careful and practical toil to undo the legislation and correct the evils put upon us by the inventive genius and extraordinary ability that have distinguished the legislation of the last ten years.

The question is not that of ability. We have abundant ability to manage and direct, not only our own, but any fair government; we have honesty and purity to give it virtue and power. Neither stands upon money, nor should either. A higher plane of thought attracts them. And, Mr. President, unless the country is moved by the consideration of duty, more than by "how much does it pay?" to use a vulgarism, we are approaching a period when the spirit of our institutions is departing from among us.

Mr. President, it is said that $25,000 is not sufficient compensation for the President. I think it is. Some of our republican friends, who oppose giving the general increase, seem to hesitate here.

The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would put his opposition to reducing the salary of the President upon the ground that he would not give any less to any future President than his predecessor got. This, then, would bind us to a most dangerous principle. You could increase extravagantly, unwisely, it may be corruptly, and thereby be concluded against making any reduction in the future. In this I cannot concur.

It is said that the age presents more demands and creates more necessities, and that our Executive in his surroundings should be made equal to all. It may be true, to some extent, that the simplicity and frugality of the past is swallowed up in the ostentation and extravagance of the present; that the black broth of Sparta is supplanted by the rich dishes of Lucullus; but still it all revolves in a cycle of time, and all must eventually end. In the revolution of things you come back again to original principles, and sometimes the worse for the wear; but come back you will, as it is in the order of nature so fixed. It is for us to say whether we shall nourish the evil or resist its spread and growth. I, for one, propose to resist it, however foolish or useless it may appear.

John Quincy Adams, as President, lived and had something left; Andrew Jackson lived and had something left; Martin Van Buren lived and had something left; John Tyler lived and had something left; James K. Polk lived and had something left; Franklin Pierce lived and had something left; Millard Fillmore lived and had something left; James Buchanan lived and had something left; Abraham Lincoln lived and had something left, and that, too, while during his term we had the most wretched currency on earth, sometimes requiring $2.80 in paper to get one dollar in coin.

The simple tastes of some of these, or taste with ornament in others, alike surrounded the Executive Mansion with respect, decorum, and dignity. There was no scramble for money! There was no cry for more! There were no complaints made either to inspire friendship or to move generosity. There was no pomp nor gaudy show; but in that unpretending mansion lived in plain republican simplicity among the most powerful executives on earth. You wish to change it. I do not.

By attaching large salaries to the office, you bring to it a regal splendor, and with it all the concomitant evils. You do not benefit the man-President, if I may so speak. You only increase the demands of society upon him, which, receiving so much, he would consider it mean not to meet. The larger the salary, the more objective would he be to all the wiles of society in its wildest fancies and to its most selfish projects. Therefore, the great head of the Republic would be liable, nay, most certain to, set dangerous examples to all below him—it may be examples of luxury, profusion, extravagance, and ostentation not befitting us as a republican people, nor advantageous to either our social or pecuniary relations and condition.

Mr. President, it is said that the rich oppose the increase of salaries and the poor favor it. This is a mistake philosophically, I think, and not true in fact. The rich, generally, want to be richer; and the higher the salary, the more motive to him; while, on the other hand, the poor—I mean the prudent poor—always, under all circumstances, appreciate the situation of things, and can more readily realize the value of both services and of money. They know that $5,000 is a sum of money that ought to compensate for fair service, and they know further that with consistent frugality they can live upon it. The higher the salary the more motive to the unscrupulous, both rich and poor, who aspire to place.

It is said that we ought to be placed beyond temptation by salaries large enough to place us beyond it. But this is not sound in principle, nor can it be done in fact. This implies corruption or susceptibility to it in all. You cannot legislate upon this principle. The man who would take the high place of either Senator or Representative to make money, or who, knowing that $5,000 was to be paid him for his services, should sell himself, could not be trusted if you made his salary $20,000; for his getting so much would only whet his appetite for more. We cannot legislate upon this principle upon the subject of salary. We must be fair and just in compensation too; but we must imply in such legislation that the representative serves rather from the higher consideration of duty to the public than as an employé for pay. And in making this compensation it ought to correspond with the relation of things around you.

We should never make it so high that an unfavorable contrast could be drawn between your own and the pay of those engaged in some similar or congenial pursuits in life. For about three months in one year and about seven months in another, of a Congress, are you engaged. Then you are at home, as you should be, attending to your ordinary business, with a salary that might justify constant employment here. You would not be able, mingling with your fellow-citizens and receiving such a salary, to escape severe, if not just, criticism, and which might breed discontent among the people, a thing above all things to be avoided where one is so personally interested. So much for my own views upon this subject generally.

I blame no one for entertaining different views, for I know upon this, as upon any other subject, there are sincere differences; and as it is a question of policy merely, like all other such questions, they are to be treated with the like candor, intelligence, and deliberation. Mr. President, I always pay great deference to any suggestion coming from my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] whose general conservative tendencies and feelings I appreciate; but I cannot see the force of his objection to the third section of the bill covering into the Treasury all money commonly called the back pay not drawn, or that may have been drawn and returned. The gentlemen who did either, I take it for granted, meant something.

There is some difference of opinion among officers of the Treasury Department whether simple return would be effective to accomplish the purpose for all time. Again, it is said by some that that not drawn is already covered into the Treasury, and cannot now be gotten out. I believe it is all now covered into the Treasury. To dispel all doubt upon the subject, however, it is important to pass this third section. We have a general law covering all undrawn appropriations into the Treasury after a certain day; but if that law does not reach this, it should be made to do so to make the law itself consistent as to all kinds of appropriations; and, therefore, I hope the objections of my honorable friend will not prevail, and that all the salary commonly called the back pay that has not been drawn, may be thus covered into the Treasury by the force of law.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] for the reasons in part assigned by other Senators who have preceded me, and who have assigned them much more effectively than I could hope to do. It appears to me that it is not practical legislation. It would not be just to those who are to come here. It has been ably discussed in a constitutional point of view by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] and by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD;] and certainly their views have much force.

We know that it is provided by the law that the salary shall be paid monthly, and we know how easy it is to get a month's salary at home and spend it. It is gone; it has been drawn since the 4th of March last; it has been paid monthly. Some gentlemen, believing that they were entitled to receive it, as they certainly were by the law, may have invested it; some may have lost it; some may have believed in Jay Cooke and the Northern Pacific Railroad and invested it in that way; some may have believed in other enterprises and invested it in them; some, receiving the money monthly, may have been more improvident than they would otherwise have been; with some, getting this money thus readily visions of comfort may have opened up and expanded. It may be that some of the gentlemen who have come here are limited in means, and they are to live, under this amendment, for the next four months without a single dollar to pay their bills. Now what are such members to do, if there be such?

While I may agree with the honorable Senator from Indiana; while we might make such a law as between ourselves, and I might concur with him, I suggest to him that he stands in the same relation to this that he does to his back pay. He does not propose to punish any member here who has received that retroactive pay by undertaking to discount that from his salary for the balance of his term in this body; then why should he undertake to discount this? There is no trouble with this any more than with the other. Both can be returned to the Treasury. While I am with the honorable Senator in repealing this increase of salary from general considerations, I ask him not to embroil this bill in troubles by any fancied—though it may be a true—sense of right which so much distinguishes the character of that honorable Senator. We have got to take things as we find them. We must take the salary of the President of the United States as we find it; we must take the salary of the judges as we find it; we must take the compensation of members of Congress as we find it. Let us redress for the future as far as we can go; but let us violate no principle of law or of right or of self-respect in doing it.

In doing anything of this kind I would not violate in the slightest degree the right of any one; and I could not by voting for such a proposition as this leave a fellow-Senator on this floor without a dollar in his pocket for the next four months, because by improvidence or by absolute want or by mistaken loans or investments he has not a dollar—coming here expecting to receive his $400 monthly to live upon during the remainder of the session. It is not just to gentlemen here or in the other House who are in that condition, if there be such; and especially when they were not members when this measure was passed, and in nowise responsible for it.

Sir, I have no particular feeling upon the details of this subject. I want to do what is fair and right. I opposed the law of last session upon the substantial basis that I was opposed to high salaries. I am in favor of moderate salaries.

I have considered the question as a matter of state policy. Sir, these are my views upon this question. It may be that I am far behind the age; still that is my misfortune. I cannot agree with these new notions. They are not a part of my nature; they are not a part of my education.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not intend to make any speech on this subject; but as I shall be called upon presently to vote on this question, I feel it proper to state some of the reasons which will govern my vote.

I shall vote to reduce the salary of members of Congress to what it was prior to the increase of the 3d of March last. In doing so I act partly in obedience to what I conceive to be the public sentiment of the country, and partly in obedience to what I believe is right and proper. I believe that there is a very decided public sentiment demanding Congress to reduce the salary of members; and when I say "a very decided public sentiment" I do not refer to all the wild clamor that has been made on this subject by designing men, either to promote their own political interests or to advance in public estimation the idea of their own virtue and morality. I ignore all that. But I believe that there is a settled opinion in the country among men who look at this question dispassionately, and without any reference to any effect upon them politically, that at the present time the salary which existed heretofore is sufficient for the services of their public servants. I thought when the act of March last was passed that it was a very unfortunate time to increase the salaries of public officers, that of members of Congress especially. The public mind had been directed, by the investigations which had taken place during the last session of Congress, to what was supposed to be corruption among members. If I had had no further objection to the enactment of the law increasing the compensation of members, a desire to avoid any charge against the members of Congress of acting from mercenary motives would have controlled my vote. I desired to avoid giving any additional grounds for that sentiment among the people of this country, or any portion of them.

But there were provisions in that bill which I thought wrong, and which I could not conscientiously support. One of those provisions was the back-pay feature. Another one of those provisions—and here I differ very much with gentlemen who have preceded me in the debate—was the increase of the President's salary. I was as firm in my conviction that the increase of the President's salary was wrong as I was in my conviction that the provision giving what is commonly termed "back pay" to Congressmen was wrong. I believed then and I believe now that the salary for the President of the United States which existed prior to the 4th of March last was ample and sufficient. I believed, furthermore, that he was the best-paid public officer in this whole country for the service rendered. It is not simply the $25,000 salary that he received, but we all know that appropriations are voted for the White House for purposes which the President would otherwise have to provide for out of his individual purse; and, taking it altogether, I suppose that he received, in perquisites of that character and the $25,000 a year—which he before received as salary—a sum equal to $40,000 or $50,000 annually; and, therefore, I thought any increase in the President's salary was unnecessary and unwise. We cannot now reduce it, because his salary has been fixed; and during the term of his office he is entitled to receive it. But I would go for a provision limiting the salary of the President, after the expiration of the present term, to the original sum of $25,000; and I would not have much hesitation in voting for a resolution suggesting to the President that, as Congress, which had increased their own pay at the same time that they had increased his, felt called upon by public sentiment to reduce their own pay, it might be proper for him to put himself in harmony with the Senate and House of Representatives on that subject.

Now, so far as the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is concerned, I shall not vote for it, and I have two reasons for not giving my vote for that amendment.

First, I have very serious doubts of our constitutional right to pass such a law. The money which a member has received, which he has put in his pocket under a law of this land, is his own; it is his, vested in him absolutely and indefeasibly; and I doubt very much the power of Congress to interfere and to attempt to take from him that which is vested absolutely in himself. I cannot cast a vote for a law on the constitutionality of which I have doubt. The inclination of my mind is pretty decided that no such power exists in Congress, and with that inclination of mind that there is no such power in Congress, I cannot, in keeping with the oath which I have taken, vote for a law of that kind.

There is another consideration which would induce me to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, even if we had the undoubted right. Even if there was no question on the subject of the right of Congress to charge up the excess over the old salary to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives now, still, as a question of propriety, I think it would not command my support. So far as I am concerned, though a man of humble means, it would make but little difference either in my comfort or convenience; but I am informed that there are gentlemen who are not so fortunate as some of the rest of us; there are gentlemen, I am told, who have not the means to return their excess of pay, and have not the means, independent of their salaries, to live while here attending to their public duties; and if that is true, no vote of mine will strip them of that which is necessary for the comfort of themselves and their families, especially when I have scruples as to my right, constitutionally, to do so. I shall therefore vote against the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

But I say now (and I do not wish in making this remark to be considered as pandering to public sentiment, or as in any way subjecting myself to the charge of being a demagogue) that if the judgment of the Senate is that we have received too much, and they desire hereafter that we shall receive less, if they desire to introduce a bill to reduce our salary to what it was prior to 1866, I will give it my support. On the salary as it then existed I can live in the city of Washington. There are other gentlemen who cannot—other gentlemen who are differently situated, who are compelled to have their families here, and I should defer a great deal to their wishes on that subject. But I say if it is the pleasure of a majority of the Senate to restore the salary to what it was prior to 1866, I will interpose no objection.

I did not desire to make a speech on this subject, Mr. President. I wished simply to state publicly the reasons that would govern my vote, both on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana and on the general proposition reported by the committee.

Mr. NORWOOD, (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Sumner—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Cameron, Dorsey, Edmunds, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Ramsey, Robertson, Sprague, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and West—15.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong this discussion——

Mr. WRIGHT. May I appeal to the Senator from California for just one moment? I want to suggest to the Senate that while I am exceedingly anxious that the vote shall be taken on this bill to-night, and, if no arrangement can be made otherwise, shall insist upon a vote if I can have the Senate stand by me, yet I want to make a proposition that we come to an agreement to take the vote on the pending amendment, and all amendments which may be offered, and on the bill, to-morrow at some hour, and that debate shall then close.

Mr. MORTON. We had better go on to-night rather than give it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa proposes an understanding of the Senate in regard to taking the vote on this question to-morrow, without further debate, at some hour to be named.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa is very reasonable. Let the hour be fixed at such time as to allow all Senators to speak who desire to speak. It is manifestly absurd in the first week of the session after the holidays to attempt to sit out a bill of this kind. That is contrary to all the practice and traditions of the Senate. We sit out a bill when debate has been exhausted, when there is a factious opposition, when it is toward the close of the session; but the idea of our sitting here until twelve or one o'clock at night, and beginning at this period of the session to make ourselves all sick (as we are obliged to do at the end of the session) is a very bad economy of time. I think the proposition which the Senator who has charge of the bill makes is very just. Let an hour be fixed—I care not how late to-morrow; four o'clock, if that will suit Senators—when we shall vote upon this bill; and in that way we shall get through with the bill quicker than we shall by attempting to sit it out to-night; for, with the vote just taken, showing only two majority against an adjournment, and with many of those who voted in the negative sorry that they voted so, it is very certain that we shall adjourn in the course of an hour or two.

Mr. CRAGIN. I would suggest two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am willing to agree to that. Say that at two o'clock to-morrow the vote shall be taken. Let that be the understanding.

Mr. STEVENSON. I object to any arrangement of that sort, limiting debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky objects.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I shall insist on going on now.

Mr. SUMNER. Then we shall have to adjourn soon.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; then we shall have to sit it out to-night.

Mr. MORTON. I hope so.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not intend to prolong this debate by any lengthy remarks that I may make——

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me one moment? I do not think the single objection of my friend from Kentucky need interrupt this arrangement, if all of us will agree to it. He will have the opportunity to speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I saw the most acrimonious and bitter discussion in consequence of such an agreement as this once in the Senate, and I determined then that I never would place myself in a position where this side of the Chamber could be charged with bad faith, and where we should not understand each other. I make the objection, not because I am not perfectly willing myself to sit here to-night until twelve o'clock, but I do not propose at this early day of the session to bind other gentlemen, who may want to discuss this measure. I will not agree to name an hour when this debate shall close.

Mr. ANTHONY. If, then, the Senator objects to naming an hour——

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not desire to prolong the thing. I am ready to vote now, this evening; I am ready to sit here and vote; but I think it is altogether wrong to agree to fix an hour, by which we deprive ourselves of the privilege of a discussion if the truth should require that discussion. I think it is unparliamentary; I think it is unworthy of the dignity of this body; I think it is an innovation upon the past history of this body, which has characterized us as one of the noblest and freest legislatures. There is no necessity for it, even. We can sit here an hour longer to-day, and we can come here an hour earlier to-morrow. If the absolute destiny of free institutions rested on our voting to-night or to-morrow, perhaps I might agree, but I do not see any such thing as that, and therefore I object to the arrangement.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, Mr. President, there is no "this side of the Chamber" or "that side of the Chamber" in this vote. Here are Senators on both sides of the Chamber who are on each side of this question.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is proposed that we agree to take the vote to-morrow at one, two, three, or four o'clock. I do not want to bind myself to that agreement. I do not think it looks like free discussion to say that, no matter what happens, we give our word of honor to take this vote at a particular hour to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I understand that the Senator from Kentucky says he will agree to take the vote to-morrow at three o'clock, but he will not bind himself to it. [Laughter.] That will be perfectly satisfactory to us all.

Mr. STEVENSON. I say that I shall not object to-morrow to taking this vote at three o'clock, but I will not agree now that it shall be done. I have no doubt we can take it before three.

Mr. ANTHONY. The rest of us will agree to it, and the Senator from Kentucky will not object; and that will make us unanimous. I do not see but that the proposition is agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD. Do I understand that one objection is sufficient?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. NORWOOD. I object to fixing any time.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill reported from the committee repealing the law by which the salaries of members of Congress and certain other officers were raised. I shall do so, not because I think the amount of compensation fixed by the new legislation is too large, but because the people seem to think so. I think it is a mistake; but I am willing to leave the responsibility with them. That mistake will be perceived by and by, and perhaps an adequate salary can be voted and received by members of Congress with the approbation of the people.

I wish to say, however, that furthermore I shall vote to put the salary which we are to receive for the rest of this Congress upon such a footing that the repeal will take effect from the 4th of March last. I have listened with some care and patience to the constitutional discussion of this question which has gone on around me, and I must say that I have been convinced that we have not the constitutional power to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. If there was power in the last Congress to make the act increasing the salaries relate back to the commencement of the session or of the Congress, there is power in this Congress to make the act decreasing relate back to the commencement of Congress. If there was jurisdiction of the whole case with the last Congress, there is jurisdiction of the whole case in this Congress; and it makes no difference whether by our law a person receives a portion of the salary due to him under the law and ascertained by Congress at one part of the year or another. I think, sir, that the call for repeal on the part of the people, if that call is recognized and is to be obeyed, means simply that matters shall be put as they were before the act of March last, and as affecting this Congress and every month of its continuance. So believing, I shall so vote.

But, sir, I cannot agree with gentlemen on my left who have criticised the other legislation of Congress at that time. I cannot believe in their declarations that the President of the United States, as now paid, is munificently rewarded for his services; that giving $50,000 to the occupant of the White House is contrary to republican simplicity; that it is encouraging a corrupting tendency on the part of the head of the Government, setting a bad example to and demoralizing the people. I have not observed about the White House since the salary has been at the increased amount that there has been any lavish profusion, that there has been any unrepublican display, that there has been any impropriety in the reception of citizens or of officials who have had necessary business or other communication with the White House.

If it was entirely consistent with republican simplicity at the organization of this Government, when members of Congress were receiving six dollars per day, and only for the days during which they served, that the President of the United States should be paid $25,000, certainly now, when, as will be admitted, the value of money is not one-half what it was then, is not one-fourth what it was then in fact, the amount of $50,000 does not keep up with the times, is not too great. Now, sir, I believe that the salary of the President of the United States, during the last four years, has not paid the expenses of the President entailed upon him by reason of his occupying that position. I believe that if a thorough investigation were proper and were fair, it would be shown as the result that the President, during the last four years, has spent five years' salary; and yet he has only lived properly and respectably in the position.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] says that there are other appropriations for the Executive Mansion which are treated as perquisites for the President of the United States, which before this increase would bring up his salary to forty or fifty thousand dollars per annum. The Senator certainly labors under a mistake in that, unless he means to charge (which I believe he does not mean) that there is peculation on the part of the President of the United States, that there is abstraction of funds appropriated for public purposes to the private use of the President of the United States.

I have before me some of the appropriations which are made for the Executive Mansion, and the ones to which I suppose the Senator referred, and it seems to me after such an extraordinary statement it is well for the Senate to listen for a moment to the appropriations and see what their character is, and let us understand whether it is true that the President of the United States is putting into his private pocket, as he does the salary which we have voted and which belongs to him, the appropriations which are made for the Executive Mansion.

I find on page 491 of the last volume of the Statutes, in the last legislative appropriation bill, that there was for improvement of the grounds behind the Executive Mansion appropriated the sum of $10,000. That went to swell the appropriations for the Executive Mansion. Does any part of that $10,000 go into the hands or pockets of the President of the United States? Was that treated as a part of his salary, or as an amount from which he could draw perquisites in any sense of the word?

On page 491 of the same volume and in the same bill I find the more specific appropriations for the Executive of the United States, such as his compensation at the rate of $25,000 under the old law; and then—

For compensation of secretary to sign patents for public lands, $1,500.

Does anybody doubt that that $1,500 goes into the pocket exclusively of the clerk who performs the manual labor of signing patents? And there are thousands of them, and I might say scores of thousands of them that go out every year to all parts of the West. Is that an amount from which the President abstracted perquisites?

Then—

For compensation to Private Secretary, $3,500.

The Private Secretary may be paid too much; but certainly the perquisites are not the President's, unless it is charged or believed that the President levies an assessment upon the salaries of these persons to go into his pocket.

Assistant secretary, $2,500; two executive clerks at $2,300 each, &c.

These officers we provide by law to occupy the Executive Mansion, to perform public business, duties well ascertained by law; and we pay them a certain rate. We may pay them too much, and there may be too many of them; but these are not perquisites of the President of the United States.

Then—

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery, $6,000.

Does anybody suppose this contingent fund can be drawn, or is drawn, by the President of the United States for his own purposes? From what source comes this increase up to forty or fifty thousand dollars under the old law which provided that the salary of the President should be $25,000 a year? Are we sufficiently careful in our statements upon these matters; and I have seen in the public press remarks somewhat like those made by the Senator from Delaware with reference to the President of the United States, speaking of these appropriations to which I referred—and if there are others of any other character I wish my attention to be called to them—implying that the President of the United States received munificently outside of his salary, for the expenses of his table, the expenses of his household, &c., from the Congress of the United States or from the Treasury, none of which are true.

Then, "for the annual repair of the Executive Mansion," on page 527, "$15,000." Is it expected that the President, out of his salary, shall keep the immense White House in order; or is it supposed that of the $15,000 appropriated to repair the Executive Mansion, part goes into the presidential pocket? "For refurnishing the same, $10,000." Is not the same argument good in reference to that item? "And for fuel for the same, $5,000." The "fuel for the same," and the gas, unquestionably are furnished by Congress; but is it supposed that in the executive rooms, used for the public business of the country, and which are occupied as the President's business offices, because we furnish him no other, these expenses should be met out of the presidential pocket, or that, being paid by Congress, they go to increase the perquisites of the President of the United States?

I ask what this mere declamation means, if there is any foundation in the statute-books or in the facts of the case for statements of this kind? That not being so, then the question again recurs, is the President paid too much by the increased salary for performing the duties and incurring the expenses of his office? As a question of mere compensation, perhaps $25,000 or $50,000, or any other given sum, might be considered by some as too much. Five thousand dollars to members of Congress might be considered too much, upon the principle stated by the Senator from Indiana in his remarks the other day, when he said the laborer in his district got but three dollars a day, and therefore why should a member of Congress receive extravagant compensation. Intellectual labor is always better and higher paid, and ought to be, than mere manual labor. Skilled labor is always paid higher than unskilled labor, and the labor of the brain is always of greater value to the world and is necessarily higher paid in order to secure it; and I think that to get those qualities of mind and education fitting men to sit in the Senate of the United States, or in the House of Representatives, or to sit in the presidential chair, to conduct all our delicate negotiations with foreign powers, to manage our finances; in case of convulsion between ourselves and other nations or in our own land, to get adequate talent to see that the country suffers no harm, we must pay for intellect, for character, for brains, and not pay the rate that is paid to the unskilled laborer who holds the plow or drives the team.

Mr. PRATT. Did I understand the Senator from California to impute the remark to me that I had said members of Congress should be paid no higher per day than common laborers?

Mr. SARGENT. No; I did not say that, and I do not so understand the Senator. I understood him to argue that the salaries of members of Congress were unreasonably large, and he referred as one evidence of that to the fact that laborers in his State received three dollars a day, or thereabouts.

Mr. PRATT. I made no such remark.

Mr. SARGENT. I may have misunderstood the Senator, but that was my impression.

Mr. PRATT. While advocating that $5,000 a year was a competent salary for members of Congress, I did state in that connection that that was a sum which would support five average families throughout the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly the idea which I understood the Senator to convey has been insisted upon by some of the press in his own State, and in some other States, that there ought to be an equality of compensation between the laborers of the country and members of Congress; and they also have said that the farmer makes but so much upon his farm per annum; at the end of the year he has but so much clear, while these aristocrats who sit in council at Washington and pretend to rule the world draw this magnificent sum of $5,000 or $7,500! As I said, such arguments are fallacious, and necessarily so. But take those five families to which the Senator alludes, and require each one of them to come to the city of Washington, pay their own expenses, and then return, maintaining themselves here at any hotel in this city, paying their bills on Pennsylvania avenue, paying the high prices charged here to any Senator or Member for the use of rooms in this city, for the humblest accommodations, and how much would they be reduced in number? You take any one of these families and bring them here, and unless they retire into the very suburbs of the city, and into the filthiest streets, and occupy the smallest rooms, and buy the cheapest provisions, and see no society, no one of them can live for less than the average member of Congress lives here; and therefore the argument advanced by the Senator is entirely without foundation.

It is well known that this is the most expensive city on the American continent, and I believe it is on the whole face of God's globe. I recently inquired the price of an article in a store on Pennsylvania avenue and was told the rate, and when about to pay it, by some accident it came to the knowledge of the person from whom I wished to buy that I was a Senator of the United States, and he made a remark having a tone of pleasantry, and perhaps meaning it merely as pleasantry, that he did not know that I was a Senator or he would have asked more. It may have been nothing but a very bad joke, but I believe it expresses a principle which is acted upon by too many of the tradesmen of this city, that members of Congress and Senators are fleeced; that Government officers are; that they are charged higher prices than others. Let any Senator go to hire a house, as we nearly all have to do, and if it is known that he is a Senator, twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred dollars a month is added from that very fact. As a principle of self-protection almost, we are compelled to get something like a decent compensation for our services.

However, I did not intend to remark upon that; it was entirely foreign to my purpose.

The members of the Cabinet receive an additional pittance of $2,000 a year by our legislation of last year. Now by this bill (and I regret this feature of the bill; it is the only regret I have in voting for it) they are cut down to $8,000 again from $10,000 a year. There are obligations of society; there are obligations that are imposed by each Senator, by each member of the House, and by the wives of such, upon Cabinet ministers and their wives, by us and by other members of society, and by all your constituents who come here to see anything of society whatever, upon these officers, to be to a certain extent hospitable, to be representatives to a certain extent of the hospitality of the American people. It is an absolute necessity of their situation; and it is so much so that no man who has not considerable resources outside of his pay can afford to keep such a station, and no one else will keep such a station long. He will be glad to get out of it. I think it is a great wrong that we do to these gentlemen in cutting down their salary, as we do by this bill, $2,000.

This argument applies with the more force to the President of the United States. He is the organ of communication between ourselves and all representatives of foreign governments. He cannot live in the mean, sordid way which some gentlemen would imply that he ought to in order to conform to their ideas of republican simplicity, which they say are twenty or thirty years old. If they are thirty years old or a hundred years old, they are false; and it is not that which the American people sober require of the President of the United States.

I will not detain the Senate by any further remarks. I will simply say that in accordance with what I believe to be an improper public sentiment, improperly fomented, starting from this Capitol and permeating from this capital city, going over the telegraph wires, and by all the modes by which prejudice is ordinarily propagated, the idea has gone out to the country that a great wrong was done by increasing salaries, when there was no wrong done, nothing but ordinary justice to those who serve the people of the United States; but the impression has gone out to the people; they honestly believe it; they ask and demand a repeal of this law, and, regardless of any personal considerations, how much I may be pinched thereby, or how much I may be called upon to supply the lack out of my own private means, I intend to conform to that wish and vote to repeal the law.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Stewart, and Sumner—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Cragin, Crozier, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Ramsey, Robertson, Sprague, Stockton, Tipton, and West—19.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 7, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MONEY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MELLISH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1014) to provide the money of the United States and to regulate the value thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

Mr. McCRARY. I am instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, instructed to pay to George A. Henry the regular compensation as clerk to the Committee on Railways and Canals from the time he actually entered upon duty as such, notwithstanding his failure to be sworn until a later day.

I will say that Mr. Henry was actually here engaged in his duties as clerk, but failed to be sworn in.

Mr. HOLMAN. He was here during this Congress?

Mr. McCRARY. During this session.

The resolution was adopted.

TRIBUNALS IN THE OTTOMAN DOMINION, ETC.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1015) to authorize the President to accept for citizens of the United States the jurisdiction of certain tribunals in the Ottoman Dominion and Egypt, established or to be established under the authority of the Sublime Porte and of the government of Egypt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1016) to establish certain regulations of commerce conducted on railroads among the several States or with foreign countries, and to regulate railroads with respect thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railroads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KASSON. In this same connection I wish to say, that I hold in my hand some very valuable statistics received from the State Department, they having been addressed to me because they were obtained at my request. They relate to the subjects before that committee, and I ask that they be printed and referred to that committee. The papers embrace the following:

1. Letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Kasson, dated September 1, 1873, with accompanying communication from the consul-general of the United States at Paris, showing prices and importations of wheat from Black Sea, Baltic, and American ports for five years; also rates of freights on English, French, German, and Belgian railways.

2. Letter from the Secretary to Mr. Kasson, dated October 22, 1873, referring to communication on same subjects from the United States consul at Berlin, and the accompanying statistical papers.

3. Letter from the Secretary of State to same, dated November 14, 1873, with report from United States legation at London upon the commerce in wheat in Great Britain, embracing railway charges for transportation of grain and live-stock on the Great Western Railway.

4. Letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture to same, dated May 6, 1873, with statements showing the prices of wheat and flour each month for five years at Chicago and New York, respectively, with quantities and values of grains exported during same years.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1017) to establish the eastern judicial district of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEADS FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1018) giving to disabled soldiers and sailors the right to homestead without previous settlement and improvement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish to the House a detailed statement of the amount of money expended and indebtedness incurred in connection with the Indian service from June 30, 1873, to December 31, 1873, together with the amount and items of deficiencies, if any, for the years 1872 and 1873; also the date of the expenditures and the bands or tribes for which made.

APPROACHES TO THE CAPITOL.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the following resolution, and ask for its consideration at this time:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the architect of the United States Capitol extension be authorized and directed to employ a man, at a salary not to exceed $60 per month, for the purpose of keeping the approaches to the House in good order during the session of Congress.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I will reserve my right to object to this resolution until I hear some explanation of it.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. This resolution is reported by the committee at the suggestion of many members of the House of Representatives, to meet a complaint frequently made since Congress has been in session, that the approaches of the Capitol, particularly on the east side, are in a filthy condition. I called the attention of the Clerk of the House and also of the architect of the Capitol extension to the matter, and each of these gentlemen insisted that with their present force they could not attend to it. The Clerk of the House said it was not his business to attend to it, and even if it was, he had nobody he could assign to that duty. The architect of the Capitol said that while it might come properly under his jurisdiction, though being outside of the Capitol, he had no one to appoint to that duty. I mean by the "approaches to the Capitol" the entrances, particularly on the east side, where teams are continually driving up, leaving the mails, ice, &c. Any member of the House desiring to ascertain the necessity of this work has only to go down now and examine for himself the locality referred to, and he will come to the same conclusion which our committee came to to-day, that the condition of that approach is a disgrace to whoever is responsible for it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is there not some person now employed whose duty it is to attend to that?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am informed by the Clerk of the House, and also by the architect of the Capitol, that there is not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Who has kept the approaches hitherto in order?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. They have not been kept clean at all.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I must object to the resolution for the present.

LEGISLATIVE EXPENSES OF COLORADO TERRITORY.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to report from the Committee on Appropriations, for immediate action, the bill (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory.

The bill was read. It appropriates $20,000 for compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, and for pay of clerks, officers, and contingent expenses thereof.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I desire to make an explanation as to the necessity for the passage of this bill at the present time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the gentleman's making his explanation, but I wish to reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The right to object will be reserved.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory meets biennially, just as the Legislatures of other Territories do, under an act of Congress passed in 1869. This appropriation to pay the expenses of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory ought to have been made by the last Congress, but was omitted by the Committee on Appropriations from the general appropriation bill, there having been no estimate for the purpose sent in by the Department. On investigation I find that no estimate was made because the secretary of the Territory failed to send to the Department a statement of the amount required to run the legislative body. Hence no estimate for this purpose was included in the estimates sent by the Department to the Committee on Appropriations, and thus the appropriation was omitted. The Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory is in session at this time; it convened last Monday. There is no appropriation to pay the expenses of running the body. Twenty thousand dollars is the amount usually appropriated for paying the expenses of these legislative bodies. As the Legislature of Colorado is now in session, there is necessity for an immediate appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has the gentleman any estimate made by the Department?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the statement read.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I have here the detailed estimate, which has been sent in from the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I have also a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I would like to have read.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there are any estimates we desire to hear them.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I send to the Clerk a detailed estimate, giving each item.

The Clerk read as follows:

Thirteen members council, $6 per day, forty days	$3,920
President council, $4 per day, forty days	160
Chief clerk council, $8 per day, forty days	320
Assistant clerk council, $5 per day, forty days	200
Enrolling clerk, $5 per day, forty days	200
Engrossing clerk, $5 per day, forty days	200
Sergeant-at-arms, $5 per day, forty days	200
Door-keeper, $5 per day, forty days	200
Watchman, $5 per day, forty days	200
Mileage members council	385
Twenty-seven members house of representatives, $6 per day, forty days	6,480
Speaker house of representatives, $4 per day, forty days	160
Chief clerk, $8 per day, forty days	320
Assistant clerk, $5 per day, forty days	200
Enrolling clerk, $5 per day, forty days	200
Engrossing clerk, $5 per day, forty days	200
Sergeant-at-arms, $5 per day, forty days	200
Door-keeper, $5 per day, forty days	200
Watchman, $5 per day, forty days	200
Mileage members house of representatives, (estimated)	900
Printing and binding laws, journals, &c., (not to exceed)	4,000
	19,045
Miscellaneous expenses, (estimated)	955
Total	20,000

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the committee propose to appropriate just the amount estimated for?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Yes, sir; just the same amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been understood that heretofore the estimates made for these territorial Legislatures have been very high; and it seems to me the committee might reduce these estimates somewhat. The estimate of six dollars a day for members of the Legislative Assembly is, I think, beyond the average.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the committee proposes to appropriate the amount provided for in the organic act, so far as the pay of members is concerned; and the amount is the same that has heretofore been appropriated for this purpose. We have looked into these estimates quite thoroughly, and we find that the amount is the least that the Territory can get along with. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. SHERWOOD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 33) directing the appointment of Professor Leo Lesquereux, of Columbus, Ohio, one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY ROLL.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1019) for the relief of Henry Roll, or his legal representatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRE-EMPTION CLAIMANTS.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1020) for the benefit of the widows of deceased pre-emption claimants; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTS AND PURCHASES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause to be furnished to this House, at as early a day as practicable, a statement of the extent and nature of the contracts, purchases, and expenditures for the Indian service made since July 1, 1873, setting forth which, if any of them, were made or entered into without conference with the board of Indian commissioners appointed by the President, and the extent and description of contracts and vouchers objected to by said board, stating to what extent payments have been made thereon against their remonstrance.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. GLOVER, and Mr. BELL were, by unanimous consent, granted leave to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD remarks which they had prepared on the civil-rights bill. [See Appendix.]

TEA, COFFEE, AND SUGAR.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Whereas, in consequence of intimations from the Committee on Ways and Means on the floor of the House of Representatives prior to the holidays, that it might be necessary for Congress to impose a tax on coffee, tea, and sugar in order to raise money to meet the expenditures of the Government; and whereas, in consequence of said intimation, the price of coffee, tea, and sugar has been so increased that it has become oppressive to the people: Therefore, in order to remove all doubts on this subject, and to relieve the country from oppression,

Be it resolved, That it is the impression of this House that no tax will be imposed upon the above-named articles by the present Congress, unless some new necessity for such taxation, not now known to the country, should arise.

MODOC INDIAN WAR.

Mr. NESMITH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public service, to furnish the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence between the different Departments of the Government and the peace commissioners during the war with the Modoc Indians in Southern Oregon and Northern California during the years 1872 and 1873; also copies of all correspondence with, and orders issued to, the military authorities engaged in such war up to the period of the removal of said Modoc Indians from the States of Oregon and California.

Mr. NESMITH moved to reconsider the motion by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider and lay upon the table all references, this morning.

The SPEAKER. No reference can be brought back under the rule by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought that restriction was confined to Monday.

The SPEAKER. The rule now applies to all references made at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair is correct.

The SPEAKER. On account of the absence of some gentlemen on Monday last, the Chair recognizes them to-day. The usual practice is not to recognize members, except on Monday, for the reference of bills.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1021) to confirm the title to certain lands on the Fort Kearney Military reservation, in Fremont County, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LOUIS J. BOYER.

Mr. CROUNSE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1022) for the relief of Louis J. Boyer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. GIBSON.

Mr. CASON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No.

1023) granting an increase of pension to George W. Gibson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM DAVENPORT.

Mr. CASON also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1024) for the relief of William Davenport, of Zionsville, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following amendment to the civil-rights bill, to be offered when in order:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to include Chinese or Mongolians within any of the provisions of this act.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. HYDE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate and report at an early day, upon the best and most practicable plan for securing cheap transportation both by water and by railways; for securing reasonable charges upon railways to all points without unjust discrimination for or against any person or locality; for preventing all combinations among common carriers calculated to prevent competition; for regulating and prescribing the duties of the officers, directors, and managing agents of railway corporations toward the public, and in the management of their trusts, and for punishing such officers, directors, and agents for extortion, fraud, breach of trust, and other willful acts injurious to the public, or to the stockholders and mortgagees of railways.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask the gentleman to strike out the word "water" and substitute "canals," which will then bring the subject properly before the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. HYDE. I do not agree to that amendment.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I object to the introduction of the resolution.

FLINT AND CHATTAHOOCHEE RIVERS.

Mr. WHITELEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1025) for the improvement of the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers, in the State of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of the reports of the surveys of the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers, in the State of Georgia.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. KNAPP asked and obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as part of the debates, some remarks on the civil-rights bill. [See Appendix.]

PAYMASTERS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Second Auditor of the Treasury Department be requested to communicate to this House what accounts of regular and additional paymasters of the Army, for disbursements during the late war, remain unsettled; what amounts, and from whom, are due, and what has been done toward their collection.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD. I send to the desk to be read an amendment which I propose to submit to the civil-rights bill, when in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That any white female who shall, by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of any negro who shall make to her any proposal of marriage, refuse such proposal, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 for each such offense.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to the reception of that amendment. That is an insult to the House and to the race.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to offer a resolution for present consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. After this resolution, I shall have to insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that nearly all the misunderstandings about legislation and things done in this House arise from what occurs within thirty minutes after the Journal is read each morning, at a time when members are for the most part undoubtedly inattentive. Doing business by unanimous consent is the mode of legislation under which mistakes most frequently arise; and if the Chair would presume to give advice to members, it would be to listen attentively during the thirty minutes after the Journal is read. After the resolution which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to offer, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has announced that he demands the regular order.

STATE AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be instructed to inquire into the expediency of constituting a commission of inquiry into the condition of the several agricultural colleges established by the several States and which have received endowments from the United States; that said commission, if established, shall diligently inquire in what manner and to what extent the provisions of the several acts of Congress on the subject have been carried out; the state of the funds of each institution, and sales, if any, of land-warrants, and to whom and for what price; the amount of land actually held by each institution and the value of the same; the system of instruction adopted by each, and how nearly such system corresponds to the tenor, true intent, and meaning of the laws of Congress on the subject; and such other matters as shall show whether or not the bounty of the United States has been diverted from its true purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

There was no objection; and the resolution was so referred.

J. C. M'BURNEY.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1026) for the relief of J. C. McBurney, of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

THE LATE GENERAL JOHN A. RAWLINS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 34) ordering the delivery of the bronze medal donated, July 14, 1870, to be applied in the execution of an equestrian monument to the late General John A. Rawlins, after the plaster-cast prepared by order of Quartermaster-General M. C. Meigs from the face of the deceased, by Fisk Mills, sculptor, and making appropriation for the cast; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 796) to protect all citizens in their civil and legal rights. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is entitled to the floor for one hour to close debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield a short time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, in contemplating this subject I am not unmindful that it is particularly invested with a historic sensitiveness which refers to the most bitter memories and tragic periods of our country's annals. That sensitiveness arises out of the rancor of party spirit, sectional animosities, and the prejudices of race which our former peculiar institutions entailed. I would that these memories were forever buried in the deep ocean of the unremembered past, and that if they leave any influence whatevr behind them they may serve to guide us as a nationality in our future course; as the rays of the sun having set in storm and tempest still linger in fitful beams to light the pathway of the benighted traveler as he is homeward bound.

There are now no longer any sections, it is true; but the political communities called States still live. That ominous parallel, however, which so long disturbed the repose of the people of these States and embroiled our legislative halls in angry discussions and tempestuous scenes, and finally culminated in the bloodiest drama of the "book of Time," has disappeared forever from the country's political geography, and no longer stands an impassable barrier to a broad patriotism and a true American statesmanship that rises above the atmosphere of mere partyism and embraces in its faith one flag, one country, and one constitution. To that complexion have we all come at last.

Turning, then, our backs upon the mad passions that existed in the past, and casting behind us every unpleasant recollection, now when the surging billows of party strife seem to be spending their forces and are "retreating to nothingness;" when the era of good-feeling is dawning upon the land, and men who were lately enemies are unfolding their hearts once again to each other, when, but yesterday as it were, they were locked in the cold, dark chambers of vengeance and hate, why may we not take counsel with and accord to each other, no matter what our antecedents may have been, perfect sincerity of purpose, and that we are all guided upon this and all kindred subjects by the light in which we view the Constitution and the best interests of a common country? From this broad stand-point alone would I view this issue, and by it direct my humble course in the march of passing and coming events.

It is a trite political maxim that the grand distinguishing feature of American politics is a written Constitution. The idea is of peculiarly American origin—one deeply grounded in the affections of the people, and is older than the Government itself, being born in the heroic age of the Revolution.

The Constitution of the United States is a tangible and well-defined chart of principles which in time of war may rest in abeyance and escape destruction, but which in times of peace is active, living, and cannot be disregarded or violated with safety to the body-politic.

In the division and distribution of political powers in this country no party has ever yet seriously denied that all power is inherent in the people, and that all governments which have been established exist and have their foundations laid in the consent and sovereign will of the people who are governed; that thirteen of these United States existed before the Union was formed and were independent of each other; that they owe the existence of their State governments to the people of those States respectively, and that the Federal Constitution, made by delegates from these States and ratified by the people in their corporate capacities, each for itself, constitutes the Government of the United States, possessed only of certain written powers and such implied powers as are essential to the execution of those expressly granted. The Government of the United States has no original sovereignty and can only exercise delegated powers, all other powers being reserved to the States or to the people. Article 10 of the Constitution reads as follows:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Now, then, with this chart of enumerated powers before us, and which claims our sworn allgeiance, gentlemen will excuse me for respectfully asking to be referred to the article, section, or line of that instrument which authorizes Congress to enact such a law as this bill proposes. If such authority exist, surely the learned jurists and eminent statesmen of the republican party can point it out specifically. Of course the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are cited as authority. Of late they have become the fruitful mother of a brood of usurpations, public wrongs, and infractions of the rights of citizens. Of the amendments I will speak presently, and only now enter my denial that such monstrous powers are derived from that source.

Let us first look a little into the legal and political analysis of the term "citizenship." Citizenship of the United States is acquired by birth, or by being naturalized under the laws of Congress, and such citizen may have no particular domicile, but may live in foreign countries or on the high seas. That citizenship does not include all the rights belonging to the people. If so, what means the language of article 9 of the Constitution, which reads:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

From this it is manifest that the people retained rights not granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution, and hence are not proper subjects of legislative control by Congress, as it has no power unless derived from the Constitution. I grant, under the powers of the Constitution, that Congress has a large circuit of jurisdiction, and yet it is compassed by definite limits. Article 10 plainly shows that the States and the people have reserved rights, and that those rights consist in every form of right known to society and to humanity, and which are not mentioned in the Constitution. Many of our fathers, whose patriotism or intelligence and public service would not pale before the gushing patriotism and statesmanship of to-day, thought that enough power was granted to the Federal Government to secure the objects for which it was created, to wit, the protection of life, liberty, and property. They are comprehensive and varied, and yet how definite! It may seem a little old-fashioned and out of style to recur to rudimentary principles, but the day will come, I hope, when reference to the Constitution will be more fashionable. And first and above all, the citizen turns to that great English and American right, which cost England many years of internecine war, and the blood of her bravest sons and purest patriots—the ever-sacred muniment of the writ of habeas corpus. This is truly the corner-stone of the temple of American liberty. To be secure in his person and papers from unlawful searches and seizures; in the right of trial by a jury of his peers; in the right of petition, and in the freedom of the press and of speech; exemption from bills of attainder or ex post facto laws; from capitation or direct tax, unless in proportion to census or enumeration previously taken; the freedom of trade and commerce between the citizens of the different States; the right to demand compensation for private property which is appropriated to public use, and very many other rights and immunities are guaranteed by that instrument. All these rights are the common heritage of every American citizen without regard to color. No legislation is necessary to enforce them anywhere, for our admirable judiciary furnishes an ample guarantee to every citizen of his full participation in, and enjoyment of, all these rights. Should any State be so untrue to herself and so unwise as to deny any of these rights to any citizen of the United States, then, of course, Congress could come to the rescue of such injured citizen by coercive legislation. But I know of no such refusal.

But, notwithstanding all these magnificent powers and rights which Congress possesses, yet there are rights which the States alone possess, and with which Congress has no power to deal. Such are the municipal law, controlling its own corporations, the law regulating the domestic concerns of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, its police regulations, creditor and debtor, &c. Then there are inborn rights of the people that neither States or the Federal Government have any control over. Such are the choice of a profession or business, the choice of obtaining education or remaining in ignorance, the choice or rejection of religion, the management of children, expatriation, the right of locomotion, &c. Now I freely admit that the fourteenth amendment conferred citizenship upon the colored population of this country, and that, in removing from one State into another State, that they are entitled to all the privileges of citizens of that State, but not to more privileges or immunities than they possess. The States have general laws upon subjects of their own interest and domestic policy which the passage of this bill would interfere with. The State of Pennsylvania recently—the key stone of the Federal arch—put in her newly-made constitution a clause forbidding persons of different races to marry. Why? Because sound public policy and the well-being of both races forbid the commingling of the blood of totally distinct races.

That was a subject over which the sovereign people of Pennsylvania chose to exercise their own free will. It was their own business and no one else's. Pennsylvania wisely declines to allow her manhood to be emasculated by the degeneracy which always marks a mongrel race. Has not Tennessee the same right, and did she not exercise it? Upon what ground was it done? Upon the ground of color and of race. But gentlemen argue that the fourteenth amendment permits no such thing as Pennsylvania and Tennessee has done. Does the fourteenth amendment undertake to go into the States and declare what shall be their internal and domestic policy, or does it simply mean to confine its jurisdiction and application to the enforcement of rights of citizens of the United States acquired under the Federal Constitution? It says:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States.

Now, citizens of the United States have no rights except those granted and conferred by the Constitution of the United States. Where in the Constitution of the United States is it declared that the Anglo-Saxon and the African race may marry? Well, if the States can regulate marriage, may they not the schools and churches?

All statesmen of all parties—indeed, the public sentiment of the colored people themselves—approve of the ordinance and statutes, now common in many of the States, which forbids intermarriage of the races. God has stamped the fiat of his condemnation upon the issue of such marriages too unmistakably to be denied—the original progenitors of both races being superior every way to the mixed offspring. If, then, the marriage of the races brings decay and death, and must be prohibited by law—leaving out of view for the present its impolicy—why have not the States the power to keep the races apart in the schools and elsewhere? These are laws and institutions arising out of local and municipal government; they belong under the American system to the States; and it will be a sad day when the representative of the people, under a delusive idea of equality before the law, shall break down and override the authority of the States and assume control of all our domestic concerns, as though this country was a grand consolidated oligarchy. Every State, according to the American idea until recently, has claimed and exercised undisputed control over its own domestic concerns. This tendency to centralization has been inherited from the teachings and practices which came into vogue during the late war, and are now sought to be made a permanent theory. The States have always controlled, among other internal matters, the regulation of their schools and churches when incorporated, their own places of amusement, their inns, public carriers, &c.

The State of Tennessee taxes its own citizens to raise a common-school fund. It is purely a State matter. The Federal Government pays not a dollar into the fund, and yet by this bill it undertakes, by prescribing severe pains and penalties, to control the manner in which that fund shall be distributed for the education of the children of the State. I do not advocate the doctrine that the colored children should not have numerically their proportionate share, although in the counties where the tax is voted the property of the white citizens furnishes nine-tenths of the school moneys; but I hold that it is the exclusive right of the State to distribute the common-school revenues in its own way, without Federal interposition. Are the States to be forced, in the education of the youth, to a procrustean rule which requires children of all colors and both sexes to be together. May not equal advantages be enjoyed by all, and yet keep the sexes and colors apart? Would that not be a general law, and would it work any deprivation or hardship to any one? The social restriction would apply to the white child as well as to the black. And admitting, under the most forced construction of the fourteenth amendment, that Congress has the right to interfere in any way—which I deny—in what respect would violence be done to the Constitution by the State law requiring the sexes and colors to be kept separate, when the same measure of justice is meted out to each? But the distinction is a plain one. The fourteenth amendment only protects the citizen in his rights as a citizen of the United States, and does not propose to interfere with the States in the management of their own domestic concerns among their own citizens under equal and uniform laws. The language of the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house case, as it is styled, is clear and conclusive.

The court says, in commenting on the fourteenth amendment:

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of the State against the legislative power of his own State, that the term "citizen of the State" should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to "citizens of the United States," in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment. If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment. * * * * But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

The friends of our federative system everywhere commend the court for this able and sound exposition of the relativs powers of the General and State governments in the face of the frowns of a party that seems bent upon blotting out all State lines and erecting a grand imperial government upon their ruins. It will serve to dispel a cloud of mist which has settled down upon the minds of many who both favored and opposed the adoption of this amendment. Like all other parts of the Constitution, it, too, is to be strictly construed as laid down in article 10. It recognizes a citizenship of the United States and it recognizes a citizenship of a State as a different thing. It awards to Congress the power to protect a citizen of the United States, and leaves untouched the rights of a citizen of a State and the rights of the State itself to its own internal control.

From all this the conclusion is inevitable that the fourteenth amendment confers no positive grant of power upon Congress, but only places a limitation or restriction upon the power of the States, forbidding the enactment of any statute that would abridge the rights of any citizen of the United States as defined by the Constitution itself; and, further, simply enjoins the duty upon Congress to provide by appropriate legislation a remedy against any such unconstitutional enactments by the State governments. No State has made it necessary for Congress to interpose to enforce this or any of the amendments, or, rather, to speak more technically, to see that the limitations of power imposed by them have been observed. And unless such prohibited legislation occurs, Congress has no power to interfere, as has been before intimated. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Fox vs. State of Ohio, to be found in 5th Howard, sustains that position.

Now, sir, I appeal to the myriads of State statutes to-day, and confidently assert that in all that mass of laws there is not to be found one that discriminates between its citizens. Nowhere does a disabling statute exist founded upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The same rights, privileges, and immunities belong to all—all enjoy the benefits of property, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The same avenues to honor and promotion are open to all who have the genius and the merit to attain to them. The same flag, Constitution, and laws protect all alike. Why ask this exclusive and class legislation? There is no State statute forbidding colored people from entering any of the schools, churches, inns, theaters, &c. They are only required to submit to even chances with white people. Is ther eany oppression or wrong in that? Nay, more; as the laws are now administered in the States a white man may be refused admittance to an inn, theater, or railway car, but under this bill a black man may force himself unwelcomed into them, or sacrifice both the liberty and the property of the proprietor. The customs of society cannot be innovated upon without producing a shock which will eventually shatter the nerves of the whole political system; and nowhere are these customs stronger or less likely to yield than in the New England States, sanctioned and strengthened as they are by the civilization running back into centuries. I greatly misinterpret the historic character of the people of rock-bound New England when they consent, under the specious and false plea of the equality of all men, that Congress, without any warrant of constitutional power, shall usurp the prerogative of the States—trample under foot their fundamental laws, simply to secure to the colored man exclusive and superior privileges in society.

There is an analogy to be drawn from the nature of the fifteenth amendment, sustaining this view that the fourteenth amendment is only inhibitory, and not a grant of positive power.

The fifteenth amendment reads as follows:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

It is impossible to state it and not see plainly that it is a mere limitation of power. The State of Massachusetts has an educational qualification, and any black man resting under that educational disability, or white man either, cannot vote. Hence you see that the State, except the single limitation imposed by the fifteenth amendment that suffrage shall not be withheld on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, has supreme control over this great bulwark of liberty, the elective franchise—even the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters is not asserted, for Congress by the terms of this amendment—its power is only negative—it confers no power, but simply imposes an impediment or limitation for certain causes upon the powers of the State in the all-important right of suffrage. Suffrage, then, the boon of an American citizen, is not derived from the Federal Government, but is essentially a right granted and controlled by the State. If, then, the States have the right to regulate suffrage with the exception referred to, and as the elective franchise outweighs in importance and power almost all other rights and immunities, why cannot the State control its affairs in matters of less moment and concernment, as schools, &c.?

The fourteenth amendment only makes an inhibition on the States; but this bill empowers Congress to disregard the State and invade the domain of the people, and operate by its penalties, through Federal courts upon individuals directly, although the State may have observed strictly the inhibition.

In most if not all of the civil-rights bills which heretofore have been introduced into Congress was contained the feature relative to the churches. This bill is silent on that subject. Has it been ascertained that our Puritan friends in some of the New England States are opposed to having their costly and magnificent temples of worship opened to the admission of the negroes—to having them seated among their wives and daughters in the worshiping congregations? How is this? I suspect that there is want of fair play in this omission in this bill. So far as the power of Congress is concerned, there can be no doubt that it has as much right to force open the doors and pews of the incorporated churches as it has to throw open the doors of our public schools and incorporated colleges and universities. Our republican friends certainly do not intend to pale before the storm of public opinion and surrender a principle. If the Federal arm is required to secure the colored man's rights in the schools, certainly in the far more important matter of the education of the soul it should be invoked. Do the friends of this bill believe that the negro has a soul? If so, are they unwilling to kneel at the same altar and receive the divine unction from the same hands? Gentlemen must be consistent.

The descendants of Roger Williams cannot tolerate interference by the Government in the religious opinions of the people. If Government can say who shall listen to the gospel, it can say who shall preach it, and what doctrines shall be taught from the pulpit, and away totters and falls to the ground our boasted fabric of religious liberty. Then would the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers no longer reverently point to Plymouth Rock and exclaim:

> Ay! call it holy ground,
> The soil where first they trod—
> They left unstained what here they found—
> Freedom to worship God.

Sir, society protests against the passage of this bill. On this point much might be said; indeed, volumes cannot contain the reasons. I will not enter upon them. I will not use any expression that can be tortured into any prejudice on account of my antecedents. If I had prejudices I have laid them all aside. I speak upon this subject from the cold stand-point of logic alone. So far as my political antecedents are concerned, I have only to say that, if my reappearance upon this floor is not proof of my loyalty to the Government, no protestations I might make would be regarded by the skeptic.

Looking at this question as an American citizen who would see the country great, prosperous, and happy—who especially desires to see the Southern States rehabilitated and relieved of political and social burdens, I tremble for the results. Let me not be misunderstood. I fear that this bill will sink those States in deeper, darker, blacker night than they have yet seen. I fear that the passage of this bill will sound the death-knell of that great, popular, and efficient instrumentality in the cause of education—the common school. The result would be especially disastrous to the poor children of the States. The rich—but they are few—have the means of educating their children wherever and under whatever auspices they may select. But the poor! Must they grow up in ignorance or be forced into the schools without regard to sex or color? Several of the Southern States have been making a manly struggle to re-establish their common schools, and if let alone will do so efficiently and justly for both colors. Take my own State. The white population is very largely in the ascendant, and yet there is a heavy colored element. No objection is ever urged to the colored children having their share of the school moneys. Men of all parties in Tennessee desire to see the colored population educated, that they may make better citizens. We want our unrivaled mineral and agricultural resources developed. We invite cordially all friends of progress as co-workers in the development and growth of our State. We think that those who wish to immigrate and settle among us would prefer, as we do, that our schools and churches for white and black should be kept separate, and each protected from all interference whatever. I believe that our colored population prefer it, unless it is among the negro politicians who are manipulated by demagogues for party purposes for special use on election days. Some of them, I admit, have got the idea of social equality in their heads. Pass this bill and it will either prove a dead letter upon the statute-book, or, if effectually enforced, then we shall have the ultima thule of these modern philanthropists and negrophilists—social equality.

Social equality means amalgamation, and that means moral and political decay. Look abroad over the wide earth, and wherever totally distinct races have amalgamated the issue has descended the stream of degeneracy with its long retinue of ills, until it reached extinction, the penalty which Nature imposes for the violation of her laws. Death to the races is a physiological result, and along with it death to the State; for "What constitutes a State, but men?" These are judgments from which there is and ought to be no appeal. We have right at our doors an illustration. Unfortunate and unhappy Mexico! A prey to contending factions, whose motto is plunder and rapine; they revel in the horrors of anarchy and misrule. Nationalities have comming'ed until almost the entire population is mongrel, and at best Mexico is a nation of castes.

Sir, it is a fearful responsibility which gentlemen assume, to force by Federal statute systems obnoxious to the people and at war, as they believe, with the constitution of the States. Such violent assumptions of power weaken the force and majesty of the laws, while its practical effect is blighting upon the cause of society and progress generally. But if the only harm to result from this most unwelcome measure were the wearing away of the rights and privileges of local State governments by the abrasion of these Federal statutes of iron rule, and by the retrogression of civilization which will assuredly follow, as effect follows cause, serious as I regard these evidences of political degeneracy and social disorder, there is still a more immediate and irritating evil, which strikes directly at the peace and happiness of the people.

Under this bill any poverty-stricken or impecunious colored man who, being too lazy to earn an honest livelihood by honest labor, can force out of others the money he seeks by false swearing; the informant being entitled to one-half the fine and the Government to the othar half, if the party who is indicted is convicted. Now, the half of $5,000 is no small sum to be held up as a reward to perjury. And even should there be no convictions, no fines or imprisonments, do not gentlemen see that a good opportunity is afforded for colored men, instigated but too often by low, cunning, and vicious white men, backed by the mailed hand of the Government, to levy blackmail upon white citizens, in order to prevent annoying and vexatious lawsuits which this most pernicious law will spawn upon the country?

May we not appeal to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to desist in further pressing this unnatural measure?

Why not withhold all legislation upon the subjects suggested in this bill, and let the States enforce and protect the rights of all its citizens by requiring that the races be kept separate in all these matters of schools, churches, cemeteries, inns, theaters, and public carriers, by protecting each race with equal laws, and requiring of each to keep aloof from the other? The bill in its present form is a direct and fatal blow to the harmony and order of our federative system, and is fraught, I fear, with the gravest results to the peace and well-being of society—a law for which there is no authority in the Constitution, and under which the States themselves will be humiliated; a law against which the masses of the people of all colors will protest, society remonstrate, civilization inveigh, and nature herself rebel.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I recognize fully the importance of the bill now before the House, as well to the legislation of the country as to the great interests of political science, and the spread of just ideas of the equality of men in all nations of the earth. No graver subject, I agree with the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] can occupy the attention of any legislative body. I desire, therefore, representing from my position as a member of the committee the majority party in this House upon this occasion, that there shall be nothing done herein by us, who have the power to do as we will, that shall not be done after the most careful consideration and deliberation, so that it shall be a measure when made law to commend itself to the judgment of all mankind. This is made a double duty upon us, having so great a majority, and being opposed by so small a minority in numbers, to see to it that by our legislation the republic shall take no detriment. And therefore it will be convenient for me to indicate the purpose I have, after finishing what I have to say, and that is, to move to recommit the bill to the committee, in order that the ten or twelve amendments which have been offered—and which are cut off by the motion to recommit—shall not fail to have that full consideration by the Law Committee of the House, to which all amendments offered in good faith are entitled in so grave a matter; and I desire further——

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Massachusetts indicates his intention—indeed he has so declared—after he has closed his remarks, to move that the bill with the amendments be recommitted?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOOD. Now, I think it due to frankness to say that after he has exhausted three or four days in fruitless debate, a proposition to recommit the bill in the same form in which he reported it is, in my judgment, trifling with this House, and with this country. He has succeeded in producing irritation and in exhausting time in impracticable speeches on a question of no practical use to the country, to the exclusion of legislation useful and necessary to the country. I say, sir, that he owes an apology to the House and the country if he proposes to recommit in view of the circumstances to which I have referred.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I may, Mr. Speaker, owe an apology to the House and the country if I move to recommit this bill, but certainly I shall not owe any apology to my friend from New York for taking such action as I believe to be just and proper when he lectures me in the time which I grant him. Further, sir, I am sorry to hear the gentleman from New York characterize this debate as "fruitless," because a large part of it has been carried on by those who associate with him politically. I thought the same thing in some degree, but I dare not say it; and I am very glad that he has said that to his political associates which my sense of courtesy to them has prevented me from saying. I leave him and the learned and distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who occupied more time than anybody else, to settle that question of fruitlessness of debate between them. It is no affair of mine. I have not occupied ten minutes yet.

Now, sir, my apology to the House for moving to recommit this bill is that I desire that these amendments which have been offered shall be fully and fairly considered. There are some twelve of them. Otherwise the majority of the House would be placed in this unpleasant position, they must either refrain from allowing amendments to be voted upon, or must take up two days in calling the roll in voting upon these twelve amendments. That is my apology to the House and the country; for let me say to the gentleman and the House that when we bring back the bill matured, after due consideration of all this "fruitless debate," and carefully weighing all the amendments offered in good faith—and in bad faith, as one or two of the latter seem to have been—we shall not allow any more time to be spent in "fruitless debate" over it, but make it the law as speedily as due regard to legislative forms will permit.

Now, sir, let me point to a few of the arguments which have been adduced against this bill on the other side of the House.

Mr. DAWES. If it will not disturb my colleague I would like to inquire whether the order authorizing the committee to report at any time will extend to a new report of the bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I so understand it. I understand that the order to report at any time will extend to a new report of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would so rule.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I so understood, and was proceeding on that assumption. I thought it due to the minority to consider their objections to the bill, dealing with them fairly, openly, and in a spirit of candor after we heard them. I was saying, when interrupted, that I proposed to reply now to some of the arguments which have been adduced as well as I may in the very short time I have reserved for myself. I should have considered more at length the constitutional argument, were it not for the exhaustive presentation by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] of the law, and the only law quoted against us in this case that has been cited, to wit, the Slaughter-house cases. He, with the true instinct of freedom, with a grasp of mind that shows him to be the peer of any man on this floor, be he who he may, has given the full strength and full power of that decision of the Supreme Court. If I should criticise that decision at all, it would be to say that I think the court has too strictly confined the operation of the fourteenth amendment to the establishment of human rights alone, for the decision says it was meant to secure human rights, personal rights, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and was meant for nothing more and did nothing more, and the decision expressly points to the security of those rights by the appropriate legislation which was enacted by that great amendment—an amendment which was a step forward in the progress of human events—which gave liberty to the world. Having myself no doubts upon the constitutionality of the measure, not believing for a moment that there is any right which a subject of Great Britain has under the Magna Charta that a citizen of the United States has not under the Constitution of the United States as now amended to conform to that great bill of rights of the subject, I pass to some other objections.

The first objection we meet, but last presented, is that we propose to establish social equality; and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CRUTCHFIELD] offered an amendment that our daughters shall be prohibited by penalty from their right of choice in those who propose marriage to them. If he has got no further than that after hearing the debate of the last few days, then, indeed, I agree with the gentleman from New York, that to some men the debate has been futile and fruitless. If he does not understand we are not enacting any such proposition, then he could never even appreciate the answer a lady of the North would make to his addresses when she answers "no," which after fathoming his capabilities would assuredly be given.

"Equality!" We do not propose to legislate to establish any equality. I am not one of those who believe that all men were created equal, if equality is to be used in its broadest sense. I believe that "equal" in the Declaration of Independence is a political word, used in a political sense, and means equality of political rights. All men are not equal. Some are born with good constitutions, good health, strength, high mental power; others are not. Now, we cannot by legislation make them equal. God has not made them equal, with equal endowments.

But this is our doctrine: Equality, if I understand it and may be allowed for the moment to speak for the republican party—and I will embody it in a single phrase, as the true touch-stone of civil liberty—is not that all men are equal, but that every man has the right to be the equal of every other man if he can. Let me repeat it. Every man has the inalienable, God-given right to be the equal of every other man if he can. And all constitutions, all laws, all enactments, all prejudices, all caste, all custom in contravention of that right is unjust, wicked, impolitic, and unchristian, and surely will be brought to naught.

This bill of ours only removes all impediments to every man in making himself the equal of every other man if God has given him the power to become thus equal; and I think the exhibition of yesterday showed that God has given to one of the negro race the power to be the equal, in all that makes a man, of the proudest man on this floor. And the debate has not been so far fruitless if it teaches us that God has not given to every man on this floor the power to be the equal of the colored man who spoke for his race yesterday, and such equality we cannot attain by legislation, or legislate some white men up to and some negroes down to the same level, however much we may try so to do. [Laughter and applause.]

Sir, we were told yesterday also that we must respect, in this regard, the prejudices of the South. Pardon me; we must lament the prejudices of men in the South. We cannot respect them; we lament them, and we pity them. With deep sorrow, and not offensively, I say this: prejudice can never be the ground of legislation in regard to the rights of the citizen—never. We must legislate to give every man who is a citizen of the United States all the rights that every other man has. We must demand that prejudice shall square itself with the law. It is to meet that prejudice that this legislation has been devised; that the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States was enacted, and to control which this legislation is brought forward.

I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] for saying, as I find in his reported speech he did say, that upon the subjects covered by this bill no State has legislated. That is exactly why we must legislate here and now. States have made no guarantees in behalf of this class of their citizens; have established no safeguards around them. It becomes our imperative duty, they being citizens of the United States, to make these guarantees, and to place around them these safeguards. That is why we are here. If it was not for this we should not have wasted any time in debate—"fruitless" or otherwise.

Again, we are told that if we do pass this bill we shall break up the common-school system of the South. I assume this is intended as a threat. If so, to that I answer, as Napoleon did, "France never negotiates under a threat." I regret the argument, if it was one, was put forward in that form. "Break up the common-school system of the South!" Why, sir, until we sent the carpet-baggers down there you had not in fact a common-school system in the South. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the fact that Texas had the finest common-school system in the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What State?

Mr. MILLS. Texas; and more lands appropriated to it than any other State, and educated every indigent child in the State long before a carpet-bagger came into it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have a report on that subject, which I had intended to read to the House.

Mr. MILLS. What report is it?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Hold a moment and you will hear it. I at first read from the North Carolina Common-School Journal, published in 1856, and from the third annual report of the superintendent of common schools of North Carolina:

COMMON SCHOOLS IN THE UNITED STATES.

There are State systems of common schools in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, North Carolina, Florida, Louisiana, Kentucky, Missouri—

And there it stops, so far as the Southern States are concerned. Where was the "finest school system" of Texas then? The report goes on:

There are also imperfect systems, intended mostly for the poor, in Virginia, Tennessee, and South Carolina; and in various counties in Virginia this system is doing good.

That is, they had pauper schools, where nobody could go unless he went as a pauper—as a matter of charity—and few took advantage of that.

There is a system in Arkansas that seems to be very imperfect, and is attended by very few children. In Mississippi there is no uniform system of common schools; but in each county there is a reservation of public lands devoted to the cause of general education. Georgia has a small school fund, from which donations are made for the poor, &c.

That is the system which I find, from southern authority, was in vogue in the Southern States before the war. There were no common schools to which every boy and girl who was of age for scholarship could with honor go, freely and without price. Of a school system the pet of the people and the pride and boast of the State, as in the North, nothing was known in the South. Indeed, if you reflect for a moment you will see that such a school system for all was then impossible. Because of your large estates, you did not live within two miles of each other, and you could hardly get two small children together within a reasonable distance to make a school. [Laughter.]

Now, then, for Texas. Texas, the gentleman says, appropriated large bodies of lands for educational purposes. Let me read from a report which bears this title: "First Annual Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Texas." When do you suppose it is dated? In 1871, long after the "carpet-baggers" had gone among you and taken control of your affairs. [Laughter.]

Now, let us see what became of this immense fund. I ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked.

This fund, that in 1861 amounted to $2,592,533.14, became during the war the prey of the enemies of the national Government, and every available portion of it was used by them, in violation of all law, for furthering their treasonable purposes. One million two hundred and eighty-five thousand three hundred and twenty-seven dollars and five cents of available funds were, from time to time, during the existence of the rebellion, withdrawn from the school fund and expended, most of it under the direction of the military board. Part of this fund accrued from sales of school lands, the balance was cash in the treasury, accrued interest and negotiable bonds and coupons. The amount ($320,367.13) given in Statement II, as part of the permanent school fund, is the interest and principal paid in by railroad companies during and at the close of the rebellion in State warrants that had been issued during the war or at its close, and represented so much money that had been applied to unlawful purposes by the rebellious State government.

Mr. MILLS. I now call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to the incorrectness of the assertion he made that there was no such thing as common schools in any of the Southern States until the "carpet-baggers" took possession of those States. The report just read shows what I intended to state to the gentleman—that out of the sales of a portion of her territory many years ago Texas set apart two of the five million dollars paid to her, and devoted the amount to common schools, or to school purposes if the gentleman likes the term better. The interest on that amount and a portion of the revenue derived from taxation were set apart for the education of her children.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield my time to the gentleman further. The difficulty is that the gentleman does not know what a system of common schools for a State is.

Mr. MILLS. Not such as you advocate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There was a very large fund devoted to schools in many of those States, but it was used only for education in the higher institutions of learning, or for "indigent scholars." There was no system under which all children could go to common schools supported at the public expense. There was a large fund; but, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Education, (which I have here but have not time to read, a report made before the war,) this fund existed on paper only, and not as an operative fact.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] told us how generous a provision had been made by the State of Kentucky for the school fund; and he threatened the repeal of that provision in case we should pass this bill. I have in my hand the laws of the State of Kentucky, and I read from an act passed in 1866:

SECTION 1. That all the taxes hereafter to be collected from negroes and mulattoes in this Commonwealth shall be set apart and constitute a separate fund for their use and benefit, one-half, if necessary, to go to the support of their paupers, and the remainder for the education of their children.

How generous! What noble generosity! [Laughter.] You collect from the poorest class in your State a capitation tax, and then say that one-half of the money so raised shall go to their paupers, and the other half to educate their children. That is all.

I read further from the same act:

SEC. 7. The auditor shall apportion each year the revenue from the fund realized under this act for the benefit of said paupers among the several counties of the State, according to the number of said paupers in each county, as shown by the reports of the several county courts, but no part of said fund—

That is the other half of it—shall not be otherwise drawn than pursuant to this act in aid of common schools for negroes and mulattoes.

Now you say that if we pass this bill you will take away that fund. Certainly, then, you will not tax the negro, will you? Let us have that understood. If you take away all use from them of the fund raised by their taxation, do not continue to tax them. The poorest class of its citizens are taxed to support their own paupers and educate their own children; and that is a Kentucky idea of a common-school system!

I am not to be moved by threats because the negroes are beyond your reach, if you choose to go into any unfriendly legislation against them. You are dependent upon them for the cultivation of your soil, for the labor in all departments of your industries, for the making of your States habitable. If you legislate against them, they will leave you to the poverty and disgrace consequent upon lazy, disgraceful poverty. [Laughter and applause.] Therefore I would, in all sincerity and kindness, advise no retaliatory or antagonistic legislation to the negro.

But there are reasons why I think this question of mixed schools should be very carefully considered. The negroes, children as well as parents, have never, till the last few years, had any opportunity for education. It is to them the greatest boon on earth. It is to them the manna from heaven. They seek it as eagerly as did the Israelites seek the good gift of God which fed them from the clouds. Therefore, in negro schools which I established as military commander during the war I found that while I had plenty of school-boys with "shining morning faces," there were none "creeping unwillingly to school." They sprang to the school as to a feast; their advancement and acquirements were wonderful. And I shall move to recommit this bill, among other reasons, because I want time to consider whether upon the whole it is just to the negro children to put them into mixed schools, where, being in the same classes with the white chilldren, they may be kept back by their white confrères, and not get on in learning as fast as they otherwise would. [Laughter.]

I do not think there will be any difference in the races in the next generation. There may be unwilling colored school-boys then as there are unwilling white school-boys now in my own State. I do not mean that white boys in Kentucky are different from white boys in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts we have truant-commissioners, who go round to see that our children go to school, because the schools are an every-day task to them—but for the colored child there is no need of any commissioner, and for this generation there never will be. And, therefore, I am quite content to consider this question in the light of what on the whole is best for the white and the colored child before the matter is again before the House.

I come now, sir, with your leave, to deal with what is the only argument which has been introduced here, the argument to prejudice The learned gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] agrees with me that every colored man now has all the rights which this bill gives him, but insists it is the States' duty to enforce them. But because of prejudice the States will not enforce them. What then? To show how deep that prejudice is in the South, and that it is not shared by the North, I call the attention of the House that there has yet, in these two days of fruitless debate, been no man from the North who calls himself a democrat who has risen to oppose this bill or make a speech against its provisions. If I am wrong in this, point him out. It shows that the North have all come to a conclusion on this subject—we on this side of the House actively, they on that side of the House passively—that these are rights guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen, and that every citizen of the United States should have the means by which to enforce them.

Mr. DEWITT. Mr. Speaker, as a northern democrat, I, for one, repudiate the inference which the gentleman chooses to draw from my silence in this debate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Who is next? [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, if these are rights, again let me ask, why should they not be given to all citizens of the United States, if we have the constitutional power so to do? If the States give them and execute them, then there will be no longer any need for this statute. It will not be enforced and will do no harm. Where a State will do its duty, there this statute will be inoperative. Where the State does not do its duty in this behalf, then the flag of the United States, and the power of the United States, and the judiciary of the United States, should protect the citizens against all unfriendly State legislation, or against the want of legislation. And I have the authority of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] for saying "that no State has legislated on the subject."

And it is because of the very prejudice which has prevented such legislation that I claim the passage of the bill.

Is it a prejudice at all? Was there any objection in the South to consorting with the negro as a slave? O, no; your children and your servants' children played together; your children sucked the same mother with your servants' children; had the same nurse; and, unless tradition speaks falsely, sometimes had the same father. [Laughter and applause.]

Would you not ride in first-class cars with your negroes in the olden time? What negro servant, accompanying its mistress or master, and administering to his or her health, was ever denied a first-class passage in a first-class car in the South before the war? What negro girl, being the nurse or servant of a lady, was not allowed to sit by that lady and her child in a first-class car? What negro servant, accompanying a lady or a gentleman, was ever denied admittance to a first-class hotel? My friend from Tennessee, confirming this, told us that in the olden time the master and his slave always used to worship together in the same churches, but that now there are separate churches, and the negroes prefer to worship by themselves.

These are facts before the war? You talk about your prejudices against social equality! I put this question to the minds and consciences of every man of you. Who is the highest in the social scale, a slave or a freeman? You once associated with the slave in every relation of life. He has now become a freeman, and now you cannot associate with him; he has got up in the scale, and you cannot stomach him. Why is this? It is because he claims that as a right which you accorded him always freely as a boon. It is because the laws of your land, the Constitution of your country, gave all men equal rights in accordance with the fiat of God Almighty which has made some of them your equal in all things, and therefore he is no longer to be associated with or tolerated! This is not a prejudice against the negro or any personal objection to him—it is a political idea only.

I had, sir, to deal with this question early in the war, and I cannot better explain the operations of this kind of prejudice than by stating the exact fact which happened on board one of the boats upon Chesapeake Bay, between Baltimore and Fortress Monroe. A member of the Christian Commission went North after two school-teachers, and brought back two ladies, one of whom had some colored blood in her veins, but so much more white that it took a connoisseur to find the color. The women bought first-class tickets, and took their state-room, sat down at the table, and paid for their supper. A Virginian, who was on board, being able to know a negro, from long use, whenever he saw one, smoked out the fact that one of them, a lady in dress, a lady in culture, a lady in manners, had some negro blood in her veins, and he complained to the clerk of the boat that he could not eat at the table in the saloon with her, and the clerk ordered her forward among the deck-hands and servants. The lady and her companion, frightened, ran to their state-room, and locked themselves in. The Virginian insisted on her being taken out of that. But a provost messenger on board was roused to his duty, and insisted that all that should be stopped. Next morning complaint was made to me as commanding general, and I sent for the clerk—an inoffensive old gentleman, who looked as if he would not harm anybody. I said, "What is all this?" He said, "I was only carrying out the rules of my boat." I said, "Do you not recognize the fact the war has made a difference in these things?" He answered, "Not in the rules of our boat." I asked, "What were the rules of your boat before the war? Could not a colored nurse go with the children of her mistress, and occupy a state-room with them?" "Yes, sir." "Could she come to the table with them?" "Yes, sir." "Which do you think, Mr. Clerk, is the highest in the social scale, a freeman or a slave?" "O, a freeman, General, of course." "Very well, Mr. Clerk; I think I can make a rule for your boat now that will be easy of enforcement. Do not go away and say that the commanding general says that the negro is as good as a white man. I am not going to say any such thing. But hereafter let this be your rule: Let no free person ever be deprived of any privileges on your boat that were ever accorded to a slave person. Do this, and there will be no trouble hereafter." And there was none.

That tells the whole story and covers the whole argument of prejudice. It is not a prejudice, gentlemen. You make a mistake. A prejudice is where you do not like the thing itself. We in the North had somewhat of this prejudice against the colored. You of the South had none. From the rarity, they were offensive to us. But we are getting used to the negro, and are getting free from our former mode of feeling and speaking on the subject. That was a prejudice. But you had not any such feeling of dislike or offensiveness at the South. Now I am getting over that feeling and you are getting it. And it is a political idea you are getting and not a prejudice at all. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, you will allow me to state how I got over my prejudices. I think the House got over theirs after the exhibition we had yesterday. I think no man will get up here and say he speaks only to white men again. He must at first show himself worthy before he can speak to some colored men in this House after what occurred yesterday. [Applause.]

I got over my prejudices from the exhibition of like high qualities in the negro, but in a different manner from that in which, I have no doubt, many a prejudice was removed against the negro in the House yesterday. In Louisiana, in 1862, when our arms were meeting with disasters before Richmond, I was in command of the city of New Orleans with a very few troops, and those daily diminishing by the diseases incident to the climate, with a larger number of confederate soldiers paroled in the city than I had troops. I called upon my Government for re-enforcements, and they could not give me any, and I therefore called upon the colored men to enlist in defense of their country. I brought together the officers of two colored regiments that had been raised by the confederates for the defense of the city against us—but which disbanded when we came there because they would not fight against us, and staid at home when their white comrades ran away—and I said, "How soon can you enlist me one thousand men?" "In ten days, General," they answered; and when the thousand men were brought together in a large hall, I saw such a body of recruits as I never saw before. Why, sir, every one of them had on a clean shirt, a thing not often got in a body of a thousand recruits. [Laughter.] I put colored officers in command of them, and I organized them. But we all had our prejudice against them. I was told they would not fight. I raised another regiment, and by the time I got them organized, before I could test their fighting qualities in the field, the exigencies of the service required that I should be relieved from the command of that department.

I came into command again in Virginia in 1863. I there organized twenty-five regiments, with some that were sent to me, and disciplined them. Still all my brother officers of the Regular Army said my colored soldiers would not fight; and I felt it was necessary that they should fight to show that their race were capable of the duties of citizens; for one of the highest duties of citizens is to defend their own liberties and their country's flag and honor.

On the 29th of September, 1864, I was ordered by the Commanding General of the armies to cross the James River at two points and attack the enemy's line of works; one in the center of their line, Fort Harrison, the other a strong work guarding their left flank at New Market Heights; and there are men on this floor who will remember that day, I doubt not, as I do myself. I gave the center of the line to the white troops, the Eighteenth Corps, under General Ord, and they attacked one very strong work and carried it gallantly. I went myself with the colored troops to attack the enemy at New Market Heights; which was the key to the enemy's flank on the north side of James River. That work was a redoubt built on the top of a hill of some considerable elevation; then running down into a marsh; in that marsh was a brook; then rising again to a plain which gently rolled away toward the river. On that plain, when the flash of dawn was breaking, I placed a column of three thousand colored troops, in close column by divisions, right in front, with guns at "right shoulder shift." I said, "That work must be taken by the weight of your column; no shot must be fired;" and to prevent their firing I had the caps taken from the nipples of their guns. Then I said, "Your cry, when you charge, will be, 'Remember Fort Pillow!'" and as the sun rose up in the heavens the order was given, "Forward," and they marched forward, steadily as if on parade—went down the hill, across the marsh, and as they got into the brook they came within range of the enemy's fire, which vigorously opened upon them. They broke a little as they forded the brook, and the column wavered. O, it was a moment of intensest anxiety, but they formed again, as they reached the firm ground, marching steadily on with closed ranks under the enemy's fire, until the head of the column reached the first line of abatis, some one hundred and fifty yards from the enemy's work. Then the ax-men ran to the front to cut away the heavy obstructions of defense, while one thousand men of the enemy, with their artillery concentrated, poured from the redoubt a heavy fire upon the head of the column hardly wider than the Clerk's desk. The ax-men went down under that murderous fire; other strong hands grasp the axes in their stead, and the abatis is cut away. Again, at double-quick, the column goes forward to within fifty yards of the fort, to meet there another line of abatis. The column halts, and there a very fire of hell is pouring upon them. The abatis resists and holds; the head of the column seems literally to melt away under the rain of shot and shell; the flags of the leading regiments go down, but a brave black hand seizes the colors; they are up again and wave their starry light over the storm of battle; again the ax-men fall, but strong hands and willing hearts seize the heavy, sharpened trees and drag them away, and the column rushes forward, and with a shout which now rings in my ear, go over that redoubt like a flash, and the enemy never stop running for four miles. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

It became my painful duty, sir, to follow in the track of that charging column, and there, in a space not wider than the Clerk's desk and three hundred yards long, lay the dead bodies of five hundred and forty-three of my colored comrades, slain in defense of their country, who had laid down their lives to uphold its flag and its honor as a willing sacrifice; and as I rode along among them, guiding my horse this way and that way lest he should profane with his hoofs what seemed to me the sacred dead, and as I looked on their bronzed faces upturned in the shining sun to heaven as if in mute appeal against the wrongs of the country for which they had given their lives, and whose flag had only been to them a flag of stripes on which no star of glory had ever shone for them—feeling I had wronged them in the past and believing what was the future of my country to them—among my dead comrades there I swore to myself a solemn oath, "May my right hand forget its cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever fail to defend the rights of these men who have given their blood for me and my country this day and for their race forever;" and, God helping me, I will keep that oath. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

From that hour all prejudice was gone, and an old-time States-right democrat became a lover of the negro race; and as long as their rights are not equal to the rights of other men under this Government I am with them against all comers, and when their rights are assured, as other men's rights are held sacred, then, I trust, we shall have what we sought to have, a united country North and South, white and black, under one glorious flag, for which we and our fathers have fought with an equal and not to be distinguished valor. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, these men have fought for their country; one of their representatives has spoken, as few can speak on this floor, for his race; they have shown themselves our equals in battle; as citizens they are kind, quiet, temperate, laborious; they have shown that they know how to exercise the right of suffrage which we have given to them, for they always vote right; they vote the republican ticket, and all the powers of death and hell cannot persuade them to do otherwise. [Laughter.] They show that they knew better than their masters did, for they always knew how to be loyal. They have industry, they have temperance, they have all the good qualities of citizens, they have bravery, they have culture, they have power, they have eloquence. And who shall say that they shall not have what the Constitution gives them—equal rights? [Continued applause.]

The SPEAKER. There has been too much tendency exhibited here of late to applaud the remarks of speakers. The rules require that upon any manifestation of applause in the galleries they shall be cleared.

The pending motion is that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that the pending bill and proposed amendments thereto be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill, to be printed and referred with the pending bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish that any member who desires to offer an amendment may have it printed and referred with the bill.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made, amendments will be received at the Clerk's desk and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No objection was made; and amendments were accordingly filed by Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, Mr. DURHAM, Mr. HATCHER, and others.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to enter the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered upon the Journal.

REPEAL OF MOIETIES TO INFORMERS, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire also to enter a motion to reconsider the order by which the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 862, to regulate the service in the collection of customs, and to repeal moieties, &c., and the same was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. Can that be done?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why not?

Mr. DAWES. The bill was first referred under the rule which does not permit it to be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider. It was taken from that committee and referred to another by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it follows that the last reference cannot be reconsidered.

Mr. DAWES. I tried to have it brought back from the committee to which it was referred.

The SPEAKER. It could not be brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider. But it was brought before the House by unanimous consent, and then referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, which reference can be reconsidered.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have the question of reference settled as early as possible.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly; that is my wish.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty-seven minutes before two o'clock. The first business in order is a bill reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, in relation to an educational fund.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some intimation as to the line proposed to be adopted in reference to this bill.

Mr. MONROE. There are some other matters to be considered before the bill to which the gentleman refers will come up. It is the design of the gentleman [Mr. G. F. HOAR] who has charge of the educational fund bill, as it is called, to give ample opportunity for discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what I desired to ascertain.

AID TO SUFFERERS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. MONROE. The Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the joint resolution (No. 31) introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SYPHER] instructing the President to issue, through the Secretary of War, rations to certain distressed persons in Louisiana, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the same back, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

I will state, briefly, the reasons which have led the committee to come to this conclusion. Every member of the committee felt a deep sympathy with what had been said upon this floor in regard to the sufferings of certain persons in that portion of our country. We gave a great deal of attention to the matter, and talked it over fully and freely. The result which the committee finally reached was this: that we do not regard it as the proper sphere of Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to enter upon a general system of providing for pauperism in the States. I think that if we were to enter upon this work, if we were to begin here, if we were to establish this precedent, we should soon find that we had entered upon the business of taking charge of pauperism generally throughout the States of this Union. The committee are already advised that if Congress shall undertake to relieve the distress of these sufferers in Louisiana, it will at once be called upon to relieve the sufferings of distressed persons, during the winter, in several other States of this Union.

We hear of distress in Chicago; of great distress in New York; of distress in other cities and in other portions of the Union. A gentleman near me says that there is great distress in Western Iowa, if I understand him correctly, and we think it certain that the committee will be overwhelmed with applications of this kind for the relief of pauperism throughout the country if we once undertake to enter upon this very broad subject. The committee shrank appalled from an undertaking of this kind. We felt that if we were to enter upon a system of this sort, it would be necessary first of all that the Committee on Ways and Means should act upon the business that must come before that committee, before we should inaugurate such a system. We think there would be no end to our work.

The committee did not feel authorized to establish a precedent of that kind. While we are truly sorry for the sufferings of these people, and wish we could, as a part of our proper business, grant them relief, yet, after discussion, we could come to no other conclusion than that we ought to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

The report was agreed to, and the joint resolution laid on the table.

Mr. MONROE moved to reconsider the motion just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. MONROE. The Committee on Education and Labor have also had under consideration sundry resolutions in regard to filling vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Some other gentlemen had asked for an opportunity to suggest names; but there seemed to be reasons for prompt action upon the subject, and the committee, therefore, instructed me to report at once a joint resolution naming certain gentlemen to fill these vacancies.

The resolution now reported by the committee is identical with that which was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] one of the regents of the institution, with the exception that in a single name we propose a change, which, it was thought, would perhaps, on the whole, more fairly distribute the appointments and meet better certain interests which were deemed by the committee to be of great importance. The highest esteem and respect were felt by the committee for all the gentlemen whose names have been suggested; but, on the whole, the arrangement proposed in the resolution which I now report seemed to the committee to be the best they could make.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 35) filling existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, was read. It provides that the existing vacancies in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than members of Congress, shall be filled by the appointment of Asa Gray, of Massachusetts, in place of Louis Agassiz, deceased; J. D. Dana, of Connecticut, in place of Theodore D. Woolsey; Henry Coppée, in place of W. B. Astor; and John McLean and Peter Parker, whose terms have expired, are to be reappointed.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to occupy one moment? I introduced yesterday and had referred to his committee a resolution in accordance with an idea I entertained, but had had no occasion to express specially, that the Smithsonian Institution, founded and endowed by the munificence of a British subject "to increase and diffuse knowledge among men," should be made, so far as possible, national in its character. Now, in looking at the list of regents, I find that while they are all most excellent and eminent men, (and I hope the day is far distant when any section of our country will not have eminent and distinguished men enough to more than furnish the list of regents,) the appointments are at present limited geographically.

I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor whether, as a matter of wise policy, it would not be well to emphasize the national character of the institution by extending geographically the citizenship of the gentlemen constituting the Board of Regents. With this view I have proposed, in the joint resolution introduced by me yesterday, that one member of the board shall be a distinguished and eminent citizen of my own State. I refer to Rev. Dr. Thomas W. Humes, president of the University of East Tennessee, a citizen by birth and continued residence in that State, and a gentleman of great attainments and high personal character: not that he is more distinguished, more worthy, or in any respect superior to the gentlemen who have been named. I make no such claim. But this gentleman, if appointed, will be the representative of a large region of our country, the great Southwest, (embracing also a portion of the South and of the West,) whose scientific possibilities are very great—whose scientific resources, if I may use that expression, have been hitherto very largely unconsidered and undeveloped. It has seemed to me wise to include in the Board of Regents a representative from that very large portion of our common country.

I do not wish it to be understood that I would not accept as readily any other distinguished name that might be suggested that would represent the same general region of country; but I certainly think it would give greater effect and importance to the labors of that institution to have its regency distributed more generally throughout the country. I am reminded by gentlemen sitting near me that there is no one on that board from either the South or the West.

I bring this subject generally before the House; I move to substitute the name of Thomas W. Humes, a citizen of Tennessee, for that of Henry Coppée, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, it may possibly interest the House if I occupy a few minutes in stating the purpose of the Smithsonian Institution; for in view of that purpose I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] himself will commend the wisdom of the recommendations we make. The Smithsonian Institution has for its Board of Regents three persons appointed from the members of this House, three persons appointed from the Senate, the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the United States, and certain other officers of the Government are regents ex officio. These officers give the regency of the institution its national character. The whole nation of course has its voice in their selection. There are six other regents who are specially appointed by joint resolution of Congress; and it is to fill vacancies in this number that this resolution is designed.

The purpose of the Smithsonian Institution is the "advancement of knowledge among men;" and after very full and thorough debate at the time of its origin, the authorities of that day determined that it was best to devote the fund at their disposal, not to the mere dissemination of knowledge as is done by the publication and distribution of books, nor to mere educational purposes as would be done by the endowment and support of institutions for instruction, but that the fund should be applied to promoting, and publishing the results of, such original investigations as may tend to advance and increase the pure scientific knowledge of mankind. To this end a fund of about $700,000, part of which is invested in buildings, leaving an income-bearing fund of about $500,000, is within the control of the institution.

The income of that fund is appropriated in this way. Suppose, for instance, an eminent mathematician says that he desires to have made a computation in connection with certain investigations to determine the cause of the perturbation of a planet, such as those of Leverrier which led to the discovery of the planet Neptune. If those investigations require a large amount of mathematical computation which may almost be termed mechanical, this would involve a good deal of expense to him. Suppose the Smithsonian Institution decides that the result of such investigation will advance scientific knowledge, it will advance a sum of money to pay for such computations, if it does not pay anything to the scientific man himself as compensation, or for support. So if a scientific man wishes to make a certain inquiry into the laws of optics or of electricity, and if the Smithsonian Institution is satisfied of the capacity of the person and of the usefulness of the results likely to be obtained, it appropriates such sum of money as may be necessary to obtain the requisite apparatus, and lets him have the use of it. And then if the result of that investigation is found to be of value to science, it appropriates the money for its publication.

Now everybody knows the familiar instance when Morse invented his alphabet for recording telegraphy. The knowledge of thelaws of magnetism, which made that magnificent invention serviceable to mankind, which has rendered the name of American science illustrious, came from the previous researches and investigations of Professor Henry, who brought from the vast treasure-house of science that knowledge of the laws of nature which the invention of Morse made useful for the practical benefit of mankind. Now, in order to determine what papers are proper to be published, or what kind of investigations, among the large number that are offered to the Smithsonian Institution, will be useful for the advancement of science, you should have among the members of that board persons who are authority in particular departments of science. They are not selected as a public honor to the persons themselves; they are not selected for the purpose of recognizing the claims of or of stimulating interest in the institution in different portions of the country; but men are selected whom Professor Henry and his associates in that institution deem competent to decide in regard to the particular scientific investigations which it may be desired to make. For instance, my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] proposed the name of Professor Snell, of Amherst College, in place of the late Professor Agassiz. Professor Snell, of Amherst, is one of the most eminent scholars of my State; a pure, earnest, modest devotee of learning, who has made a thousand contributions to science, for which he has received no benefit. But Professor Snell's life has been devoted to the investigation of optics, magnetism, and certain branches of natural science, which are also the special pursuits of Professor Henry, the secretary and director of the institution; and it is not important, therefore, to add at this moment to the force of the Smithsonian Institution another gentleman who will be an authority on matters of optics, magnetism, galvanism, &c. But one thing on which Professor Agassiz, just deceased, was the great authority in this country and the world, was natural history, including the growth of animals, the origin of species, the growth of plants, of trees, &c., and this is a matter in regard to which the science of the world is especially busying itself at the present time, and of a knowledge of which the practical need of this country is the greatest.

The prairie lands of the Northwest, which lie between the dense settlements of the Atlantic and the Pacific, are in need of the scientific information—as my friend [Mr. KELLEY] who does me the honor to listen to me, knows very well—which may cover those lands with forests, with shade-trees, with vegetation. Professor Gray is, perhaps, the greatest authority in the world on that special matter. Now, how idle, how unwise, it would be for the members of this House to say that, because Colorado or Wyoming are to be represented on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, they may appoint some man from those Territories rather than appoint Professor Gray, the greatest authority on this question. He happened to reside at Cambridge in his youth and in the time of his early studies. The libraries and scientific apparatus which were necessary for the prosecution of his studies in that department of science, were there. So in the case of Professor Dana. I suppose any California gentleman on this floor will agree that no man has been so great a benefactor to the development of the mineral resources of the State of California as Professors Dana and Whitney. (Professor Whitney, indeed, has resided in California of late years.) Professor Dana is a great authority on matters of mines and minerals, and his life has been where a library and apparatus, making the prosecution of his labors pleasant and profitable, existed.

Now the name of Alexander T. Stewart, a distinguished financier, has been recommended in the place of another man of wealth and a business man in the State of New York, (Mr. Astor,) and the committee would have been delighted to adopt that recommendation; but we were informed by a gentleman on the committee, from the State of New York, that the state of Mr. Stewart's health is such that it would not be certain he would be able to give his personal attention to the busi ness of the Board of Regents. Therefore, because it was not a matter of personal honor, but because it was a matter of supplying the wants of this institution, we recommend in his stead the name of an eminent man of science in the State of Pennsylvania, formerly the head of a university in that State, who adds to the reputation and capacity of a scientific man great financial ability, as exhibited in the management of his institution.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts, before he sits down, please tell me whether Mr. Astor retires at his own request?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr WOOD. I am sorry for it, for he is one of the best belle-lettres scholars in the country. I will say, further, that I cannot see what practical service these gentlemen render when they come here once a year for a day or two.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am glad the gentleman has made that suggestion. Suppose the gentleman from New York goes to Professor Henry with a paper composed by himself or some friend, or asking an investigation involving the use of apparatus or other expenditure from the funds of the institution; Professor Henry refers that paper or that request for an examination to one of these scientific gentlemen; he sends it to him at his home, and he spends perhaps days or weeks in determining whether the paper is one proper to be published at the expense of the Smithsonian Institute, or whether the investigation is one fit to be pursued. This meeting once or twice a year in Washington is but a trifle to the labor which these five or six scientific gentlemen perform in the course of the year. There is residing in my own city a gentleman, the librarian of the antiquarian society there, who prepared by the labor of years a very interesting and important paper upon the origin of races in this country—the aboriginal settlers of the country. That paper was published at the expense of the Smithsonian Institute; and now letters come from all parts of Europe testifying to the appreciation of the scientific world of that paper published by the Smithsonian Institute. Now, the man who is to pronounce upon the character of a publication, or upon the propriety of an examination, should be the best authority upon that special question in the country.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire, in the first place, to make a verbal correction. My friend from Massachusetts has fallen into a common error in speaking of this establishment as the "Smithsonian Institute." James Smithson, who founded it, called it the "Smithsonian Institution."

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I am much obliged to the gentleman for that correction; and now will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House, with regard to the gentleman whose name he proposes, what special branch of science he has devoted himself to? I am not myself as familiar with his labors as perhaps I ought to be.

Mr. MAYNARD. I listened to the gentleman from Massachusetts with great pleasure and instruction, as I always do. We can best ascertain the character of the regency of the Smithsonian Institution by giving the names and residences of those who recently constituted it. They are, Louis Agassiz, a citizen of Massachusetts; Theodore D. Woolsey, a citizen of Connecticut; William B. Astor, a citizen of New York; Peter Parker and William T. Sherman, citizens of Washington; and John MacLean, a citizen of New Jersey. All of these gentlemen, it will be seen, come within the category of the gentleman from Massachusetts; but the time has not yet come, and I trust it never may come, when the scientific talent of the country will be confined within a limited area.

The gentlemen proposed are all distinguished, and I did not predicate my motion upon any unfitness, suggested or implied, or intended to be understood, in reference to the superior fitness of any one of them. I suggested what seemed to me to be a better and wiser administration of this great public trust—a trust committed to us in the presence of the civilized world, and for the wise administration of which we stand conspicuously responsible. My suggestion is that we should select the regency from different portions of the land, so as to represent the vast geography of the whole country. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks me what have been the distinguishing studies and the character of the intellectual labors of the eminent gentleman whose name I have ventured to mention—a divine of eminence in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and at the head of the leading university of my State, if not of the great Southwest. He is eminent for his high literary and scientific attainments, and has been a scholar all his life; and his head, like mine and that of my friend, begins to bleach from the effect of years. Many gentlemen on this floor are acquainted with him personally or by character, and there will be no controversy, I am sure, about his fitness for this duty. But I have placed the discussion upon higher ground. The question is, whether it is not a wiser, better, more politic arrangement, other things equal, to distribute these offices a little more, rather than to concentrate the whole regency within a few States upon the Atlantic coast. With these remarks I leave the question.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in regard to what has been said of the action of the committee on this subject. It is a matter of great delicacy to discuss this question here in the House to any great extent, and to discuss the multitude of names that would at once be offered here if the question of the claims of the several States were to be fully examined on this floor; for their claims are all very excellent and very valid. I am not without some sympathy with the local feeling expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] As a member of the committee I represent Ohio. Now, Ohio is a State also; there is some land in Ohio; it is quite a piece of territory; and I could not help thinking of a large number of accomplished gentlemen and dear friends of mine in that State, some of whom I would be very glad to have named for these places, and men whom I know would have filled them with credit to themselves and with high usefulness to the objects of the institution. But I saw at once that this was just one of those questions in which we must give up local preferences. In discussing questions of science, of all others, I imagine on the whole a man will be most useful who can be most capable and who can yield most readily to local preference belonging to his own district. I recognized the necessity for that; and although I had no doubt I had even in my own congressional district, where there are four colleges of a very high order, the very best men in the world to fill these vacancies, I thought it quite right to make the great sacrifice of yielding up this question of the local claims of my congressional district.

What is there of locality about these great names in science? Who cares anything about where their domicile is? How inferior any question of that sort is in comparison with the high commission upon which God has sent them into this world and the grand work they are accomplishing! Will anybody who hears me tell me that Professor Dana, of New Haven, is not a man in whom my own locality will be interested? He belongs to my locality; he belongs to my vicinage; he is my neighbor; he is one of the nearest and best of my neighbors; he is by intellect among the men in whom my neighborhood has the deepest interest; he belongs to my neighborhood; and so do Professor Gray and Professor Agassiz. They have, by the services they have rendered and are rendering to science, secured the interest not only of New England and New York, but the interest of the whole world. And there is no better principle, Mr. Speaker, upon which to select these men than to search diligently for the best and put them in these places. We, therefore, thought it best upon the whole to make this report and secure its adoption by the House if we could.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MONROE. I was going to demand the previous question on this matter, but I will yield to the gentleman from New York. I recognize his right to be heard.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, his Private Secretary, together with an announcement that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 470) relating to the limitation of steam-pressure on all vessels used exclusively for towing and carrying freight on the Mississippi River and its tributaries; and

An act (H. R. No. 482) to correct the enrollment of an act entitled "An act for the relief of P. W. Standefer."

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. COX. I would not intrude my voice on the House on this question but for the fact that for some dozen of years I have been more or less associated with this Smithsonian regency; and I would say to the House we have never had any special need for men of financial ability, at least since I have been a regent of the Smithsonian Institution. Our affairs have been conducted with economy. There has been no surplus which has not been used in a proper way, and there has been no deficiency. I supposed the Board of Regents had sent in the name of Mr. Stewart in place of Mr. Astor after some consultation with him, but I learn this committee has withdrawn the name of Mr. Stewart on the simple suggestion that his health is not good.

I propose to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee so as to replace the name of Mr. Alexander T. Stewart, of New York; and I do it for this reason: There is no special need or requirement for the presence of these regents at Washington except once or twice a year. There is no special need for any culture in any particular line of science, on the part of some of the regents at least, for we are supplied with men of that quality in the presidents and professors of colleges who are now there. But I will say, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. Stewart, who is perhaps entirely ignorant of these proceedings, that he adds to his great wealth, his wonderful mercantile ability, and his skill in finance, rare education and great refinement of culture. He would give strength, solidity, firmness, to this institution. I think the original idea should be carried out, and his name replaced. Then we would avoid all these discussions as to particular localities which have been raised by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] in the suggestion of a man from that State. I therefore move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee by inserting the name of Alexander T. Stewart.

Mr. MONROE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STORM,] a member of the committee, after which I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. STORM. I hope that the resolution, as modified by the Committee on Education and Labor, will be adopted. That committee carefully considered the resolution referred to, and came to the conclusion which they have reported. The name of Mr. Stewart was before that committee, together with several other names. After full discussion and interchange of views by the members of the committee they came to this conclusion, and I trust the action of the committee will be approved by this House at this time.

If we follow the course indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] I have no doubt that every gentleman upon this floor has some particular friend whom he would desire to honor by suggesting his name for this position. The committee have looked solely to the qualifications, scientific and literary, of the persons whose names have been suggested. If the gentleman can give one single reason or state one single particular wherein Mr. Stewart is superior to Professor Coppée, I will yield to him. Mr. Stewart is a merchant, of large business, engrossed and absorbed in mercantile pursuits. I dare say he would be entirely unable to pay any attention at all to any question that might be referred to him should he be appointed to this place.

Professor Coppée, as a scientific and literary man, is abreast with the age upon all questions of science, and is largely interested in metallurgy, civil engineering, and mining, questions which are now pressing themselves upon the attention of our colleges and schools, and the study of which is replacing the old study of the dead languages. He has given great attention to these matters, and is to-day in Pennsylvania one of the leading scientific minds upon all these great questions, in which the people have such a deep interest. I think that it is due to that class of our people that they should be represented upon the Board of Regents by such a man as Professor Coppée. He is in every way qualified for the place, and I think to strike him from the list proposed would be an ungracious act, and one which the House would not desire to perform, and to replace him by a man who has nothing but his wealth to recommend him.

Professor Coppée has a thorough military training, has been honorably connected with some of our most honored colleges, and is now the president of the Packer University. He has published one of the best text-books we have on logic and rhetoric; he is the historian of General Grant, and his criticisms on the military movements of the Army in the late war are the best we have. He is a scholar of high attainments and of great financial ability, and his appointment would be a deserved compliment to his great talent.

Mr. MONROE. I now call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman call the previous question on the bill and amendments?

Mr. MONROE. At the earnest requests of gentlemen I gave my personal consent that a vote should be had upon the amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. Did the committee instruct you to do that?

Mr. MONROE. No; the committee gave me no instructions.

Mr. RANDALL. Then you cannot permit it.

Mr. MONROE. I merely said that I was willing to have votes taken on these amendments.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Allow me to make a suggestion. Should the House vote down the previous question, and permit amendments to be in order, and the name of any gentleman should be proposed and rejected, it would put him in a very uncomfortable position. But if the House should sustain the previous question it will determine that the House will adopt the recommendation of the committee as a whole. I hope, therefore, that the chairman [Mr. MONROE] will insist upon the previous question upon the bill without amendments.

Mr. MAYNARD. After having debated the matter for half an hour, I think that is an unkind suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there is but one safe course for us to pursue in all such matters. We cannot in this House canvass the personal merits or qualifications of individuals. I dare say that Mr. Stewart is a very proper man for the place. But the committee have fully examined the whole question, and have made their report. I think the only safe course for us to pursue is to adopt the report of the committee.

In regard to Professor Coppée, allow me to say that he is a gentleman I have known for years. He was a professor in the university in which I was partly educated, and is without a superior in science or literature in this country. He would be a very worthy successor to Mr. Agassiz.

Mr. MONROE. I must now call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman include amendments?

Mr. MONROE. I have given my consent personally. Am I the proper person to decide that question?

The SPEAKER. The only person.

Mr. MONROE. Then I will call for the previous question upon the bill and amendments of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] moves to insert instead of the name of Henry Coppée, of Pennsylvania, the name of Thomas W. Humes, of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moves, as an amendment to the amendment, to insert instead of the name of Mr. Humes the name of Alexander T. Stewart, of New York. The first question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD, it was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MONROE moved to reconsider the vote by which tee joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DONATION TO MICHIGAN FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

Mr. MONROE. I am also instructed to report back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 169) to grant the buildings and grounds known as Detroit arsenal to the State of Michigan, for the purpose of aiding said State in establishing and maintaining thereon a free industrial university. We have considered this bill with some care, and, seeing no objection to it, recommend its passage with the amendment.

The bill, as amended by the committee, was read. It provides that one parcel of land in the township of Dearborn, in Michigan, together with the buildings thereon, known as Detroit arsenal, be granted and conveyed to the State of Michigan for the purpose of aiding the State in establishing upon the land a school of technology. The land is granted upon the condition that the Legislature of the State shall, within two years from the passage of the act, enact the necessary laws to provide for the establishment of a school of technology and provide for its maintenance.

Mr. MONROE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] to explain the object of this bill, of which he is the author.

Mr. FIELD. The Secretary of War in his annual report has recommended the sale of this property known as the Detroit arsenal. It contains a little more than two hundred and twenty acres of land, and the buildings, although erected upon this property about forty years ago, are suitable for a technological school.

The committee in reporting this bill recommend that this property known as the Detroit arsenal be conveyed to the State of Michigan, on condition that the Legislature of that State shall within two years establish upon the ground a school of technology.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that over thirty years ago Congress granted to the State of Michigan certain public lands which have been used by that State in establishing a great university, known throughout the country as the University of Michigan; and I wish to call attention to the fact that although this university is maintained by the State of Michigan, it is freely open to citizens of every State of the Union, and thousands from other States have received at this university the benefit of a liberal education. It is the intention of this bill, in conveying to the State of Michigan this small parcel of property, to aid in the establishment of a technological school there, the advantages of which may be enjoyed by citizens of every State.

I am very much obliged to the chairman of the committee for the time he has given me.

Mr. MONROE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I do not desire to occupy ten minutes. I merely wish to say that the committee have given to the House no information as yet in regard to the value of the property which is thus proposed to be donated to the State of Michigan; and now when our national Treasury is worse than empty—when it is proposed to raise new taxes by special levies—it is not a time when we can afford to give away public property, which, if not needed by the Government for public purposes, can be offered for sale, and the proceeds used for the general benefit of the country. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] will be good enough to tell us whether this property is situated near the city of Detroit, and what may be its value.

Mr. FIELD. I will do so. This arsenal is located at Dearborn, a village ten miles from the city of Detroit, on the Michigan Central Railroad. The grounds embrace about two hundred and twenty-four acres, and are estimated by the Chief of Ordnance to be worth $33,000, exclusive of the buildings. There are upon the grounds a number of buildings, which for any other purpose than that of a technological school would be almost worthless. If this property should be offered for sale, as recommended by the Secretary of War in his annual report, the sale, whether public or private, would not probably realize $25,000.

I will state for the information of the House that we have precedents for this action. On the 13th of October, 1853, the arsenal at New Castle, Delaware, was donated to the town of New Castle, and, I believe, for educational or charitable purposes. By acts approved July 25, 1868, and March 3, 1869, a portion of the arsenal property at Saint Louis was given to that city for some public purpose of a local character. By an act approved December 15, 1868, portions of the arsenal property at Harper's Ferry were conveyed for charitable and educational purposes. I call attention also to the fact that by the act of December 15, 1870, the Apalachicola arsenal, with seventeen hundred and thirty acres of land, was conveyed to the State of Florida for educational purposes. The Vergennes arsenal, in the State of Vermont, was, I believe, offered for sale, and the insignificant sum of $10,000 was realized for the property. But on the plan recommended by the committee, if these arsenal grounds at Dearborn are conveyed to the State of Michigan, it will be on the express condition that the Legislature of that State shall by law provide for the establishment and maintenance of a technological school as a free educational institution for the benefit of the people of the whole country.

If by granting this parcel of land to the State of Michigan, Congress shall secure the establishment of a school of technology, to be open free to all, it will obtain a compensation a thousand times greater, in my judgment, than any money price that can be obtained for it.

Mr. KASSON. I am obliged to the gentleman for the statement he has made; but I observe the bill provides for the disposition of one "section" of land, meaning, I suppose, a statutory section.

Mr. FIELD. That is the language of the printed bill; but it has been amended by the committee so as to read one "parcel" of ground.

Mr. KASSON. It is estimated to be $33,000 in value, apart from the buildings. It is also not recommended by the War Department to be donated, but only to be sold. We have just cut down the War Department, or propose to do it, on its estimates by many millions of dollars; and yet we are now asked to give away what might otherwise add to the resources of that Department of the Government. I have every sympathy with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELDS] in his desire to secure this grant for this purpose for his State. I have no complaint to make against any gentleman to have any such property of the United States in his State donated for like purposes of education. The only point I make is, that we ought not to give away one single dime of the public money or one acre of the public land at this time without the fullest consideration. If we have established precedents, as we have done heretofore, in giving away property, I think it is time to stop those precedents. Let us not make now any others.

When you examine this bill you will see that it is entirely unguarded; that it is not guarded like the agricultural-college-land bill, where we went on to provide details for execution by the States of the duty imposed upon them. This is simply a grant of this property, not to be forfeited by the failure of any conditions. There is no provision for forfeiture. The State is in four lines required to establish an industrial university and provide for its continuance. There are no terms or conditions whether it is to be free or not. There are no terms whatever on the subject.

I do not rise, however, Mr. Speaker, to go into a consideration of the details of this bill, but only to call attention to the fact that we here propose to give away, without any recommendation of the War Department, valuable property belonging to the United States, and that, too, for the purpose of establishing a new kind of school, which we have not provided for any other State in the Union. We have given to all of the Western States university land alike; we have given to all the States in the Union agricultural-college lands; but we have not yet established the principle of giving away Government property for the purpose of allowing one State to establish in its borders a school under its own exclusive control and regulation, without the right on the part of any citizen of any other State to enter it. I hope the committee, therefore, will have the bill recommitted.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, this property in dispute does not lie in or upon the borders of any city where it is of any more value than any other agricultural land in the country. It is at a little village, more than ten miles from the city of Detroit, and so far removed that the value of property in that city does not affect the value of this property. It has been established since the time of the last war. It is in the midst of an agricultural district and on the borders of a little village of a few hundred inhabitants, walled in, with certain buildings on it, and is used by the United States as an arsenal. It was located at that distance from the city of Detroit and from the Detroit River as a protection against incursions from Canada. In the midst of that little community it has lain there some thirty-five or forty years. It has occupied so much of the surface of Michigan, paying no taxes and doing no benefit to the State of Michigan, and adding nothing to its own value up to this time. There are buildings on it which are used as an arsenal by the Government, and for other purposes. Those buildings with few changes can be made to answer the purposes proposed in the pending bill. The walls built around this public property as well as buildings upon it can be fitted up for such a public school as is proposed with very little additional expense. They could not well be adapted to any other purpose.

As I have said, this property is in the midst of an agricultural region. It would bring at a sale nothing more than the value of the material upon it. I submit, therefore, in accordance to the precedents established in regard to many of the other States, North and South, where there was like property belonging to the Government, that we should turn over this property, which has been lying in our State free from taxes, for the last forty years, to be used in the establishment of this university, for the benefit not only of the citizens of Michigan, but for the benefit of the citizens of all the States.

And it does not become a liberal-minded gentleman from Iowa, [Mr KASSON,] to which State has been dealt out with bountiful hand, ay, with bountiful hands, the public lands of the country for railroads and agricultural colleges and for all the purposes of the improvement of that State, until it has been put far in advance of the older States of the country in all the materials of wealth and the means of communication—I say that it does not become my friend from Iowa, whose State has received such liberal donations from the Government, to oppose this bill. I regret that opposition should have come from him.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will observe that my point is that this is a donation to this State only, and does not apply to the other States. If we grant this to this State, in practice we must follow out the precedent and grant likewise similar property to the other States. But I call his attention to the language here used, that this is for the establishment of an industrial university. Now, what does that mean?

Mr. CONGER. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman answers that, let me say one thing more.

Mr. CONGER. Let me answer that question first. I will tell the gentleman what it means. It means, that although there are universities and colleges in this land to which the sons of the rich can go and receive the mental culture which their money will furnish the means to buy—although we have established and provided for that, and established in the Northern States agricultural colleges to which the sons of farmers and of others may go for instruction in agriculture, yet there is a class of earnest seekers after knowledge, to be used in other pursuits and other businesses of life than those contemplated by the agricultural colleges, for which there is no provision in the Western States. It means that there are young men all over the land who desire an education, by which they may become engineers, by which they may become scientific and skilled mechanics, for which there are no universities and for which there are no privileges. It means to provide a place for the industrious, poor, earnest seeker for that knowledge which will fit him for taking his place in the various branches of business for which in the West we have no institution.

I know not what the opportunities of the gentleman from Iowa in early life may have been, but I know and he knows that scattered through the West there are young men by tens, by scores, by thousands, longing for an opportunity, without going through the full course of education provided for in our universities and colleges—longing for an opportunity to perfect themselves in the knowledge of particular branches of industry and skill, where in a shorter time than the colleges require they can fit themselves for an honorable struggle in the battle of life. It is for such a purpose that this school is designed to be established in our State. The State of Michigan has long endeavored to provide for the establishment of such a school as a part of its great and glorious system of education by its own means, but hitherto it has not been able to accomplish this.

I trust that, if that course be thought desirable, the bill may be recommitted to the committee, in order that it may be perfected so as to obviate the objections of the gentleman from Iowa, or any other objection that may be made; and I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] to make that motion.

Mr. MONROE. As I see that the morning hour has about expired I will say but a single word. A good deal of interest was expressed in this measure by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and such explanations were made as greatly interested the committee in the matter, and they were willing that the sense of the House should be tested in regard to it. But it is evident that the bill should be further considered by the committee before being finally passed upon in the House. I therefore move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SPEER. I think this bill should go to the Committee on Military Affairs. It relates to lands belonging to the Government of the United States especially in the charge of the Secretary of War. It is not a bill properly for the Committee on Education and Labor; and, therefore, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, by substituting the Committee on Military Affairs for the Committee on Education and Labor. The Committee on Military Affairs is the committee where it properly belongs.

Mr. CONGER. This property is not now used for military purposes, and the War Department recommends its sale.

Mr. SPEER. Does not the arsenal belong to the Government of the United States?

Mr. CONGER. But it is an unused arsenal.

Mr. SPEER. The bill belongs properly to the Committee on Military Affairs, and, therefore, I hope it will be sent to it.

Mr. MONROE. I have no feeling, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of commitment. The bill was not sent to the Committee on Education and Labor at the request of myself or of any member of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. I understand that. I meant to make no reflection on the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MONROE. But now that the bill has been sent to us, and since, so far as I can judge, the Committee on Education and Labor have exhibited considerable ability in taking proper care of it, I hope the House will send it back to that committee.

The question was on Mr. SPEER'S amendment to Mr. MONROE'S motion, to substitute the Committee on Military Affairs instead of the Committee on Education and Labor; and being taken there were—ayes 67, noes 61; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers, and names the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. MONROE,) and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SPEER.)

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion as amended, and it was agreed to. So the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NANTUCKET HARBOR.

The SPEAKER. Reports from the Committee on Education and Labor are still in order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution which is not reported from the Committee on Education and Labor.

It is for a survey of the harbor of Nantucket, which can be made at a very trifling expense.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause an examination to be made of the harbor of Nantucket, Massachusetts, with a view to dredging and improving the same by deepening the water in such harbor on what is known as the "Haul-over," so as to offer greater protection and facilities to commerce; and that he report upon the feasibility of making such improvement and the probable cost thereof to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It has been referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and a majority of that committee have authorized me to put it on its passage. It is a mere resolution for a survey at a very trifling cost. Surveys are now going on close to the spot, and my colleague [Mr. BUFFINTON] wants it passed early so that the same surveyors may perform this work.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it has been referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, of course I do not object.

Mr. WHEELER. I know of no reason why this should be made an exceptional case. I hope that it will take the ordinary course, and be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objecting to the resolution, it, of course, cannot be considered now.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I ask, then, that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

No objection was made, so the resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund, and to apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been read twice and has been read at length. It will not, therefore, be read now unless some gentleman requires it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that when this bill was reported the other day a motion to recommit was entered, and that other reports from the committee have merely come in out of order during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts, in consideration of the unusual importance of this measure, will indicate to the House the course he proposes to pursue in allowing debate, and whether the bill is to be left open for amendments or not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I propose to allow such debate as shall be desired by the House, and to enter a motion to recommit, and let the debate proceed under that motion. The sense of the House will be tested in some way or other as to the length of the debate. I propose to resist as far as I possibly can all hostile amendments, all amendments designed, not to perfect the bill, but to embarrass it.

Mr. Speaker, after the excited discussions which have taken place in the House during the whole of the present session, I suppose it is not disagreeable to all of us to address ourselves to a measure intended purely for the benefit of the country, containing nothing which can appeal to partisan or sectional ambition, interest, or desire.

One-fourth of the voters of the country to-day are unable to read or write. For the next ten years thirty-two Senators and one hundred and four Representatives, constituting, when voting compactly, a power which will be able to control on very important measures of legislation of the country, are to be chosen by States one-half of whose voting population have not knowledge enough of reading or writing to make either of practical advantage in receiving or conveying information. This condition of things, disclosed by the census of 1870, is, in the opinion of those persons most capable of judging, growing worse instead of better. And if a census were to be taken of the illiterate portion of the population of the country to-day, it would disclose a very much larger number unable to derive any information in the discharge of their duties as citizens from reading, and unable to convey such information to others by writing. It is true, I ought to say, that a sentiment has grown up in many, and perhaps all, of the States which promises better things in that respect; that is an encouraging symptom. It is true, also, that the State of Virginia is a most conspicuous and honorable exception to the general statement that I have made. But, with the exception of the fact that men are waking up in the southern portion of the country to labor in this matter, and with the exception of the State of Virginia, to whose democratic authorities I desire to pay a tribute of respect which their recognition of this great work deserves, this condition of things is rapidly growing worse.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a republic. The public opinion of this country is to determine its policy. Upon the intelligence and soundness of that public opinion is to depend the fate of the continent which we possess, with its vast resources, its vast wealth, its vast hopes. Upon the public opinion of this country and the influence which that public opinion may have upon its political policy is to depend the fate of the principles of self-government the world over. Now, Mr. Speaker, the republican statesmen of the period of reconstruction made, in my judgment, one grave and almost fatal error. They forced upon unwilling communities the principle of absolute equality in political power and political rights, without distinction of race, color, or intelligence. In this they did right. They said to twelve States which had withdrawn themselves from their political relations to the Government that if they were restored to the Government, they should establish their political institutions upon the doctrine which I have stated. Sir, they themselves represented States which for two and a half centuries, in some cases down to the newest State admitted on the Pacific coast, had recognized in their own constitutions the absolute, essential necessity of making suffrage intelligent, by provision for a comprehensive, universal, free system of public education. And, sir, whatever of wealth, whatever of political success, whatever of strength they had, was owing to the recognition of that essential principle. Weak and blind—I may say that of them, as they belong to my own party—they failed to see the need of applying to the Southern States this principle recognized in their own constitutions. It is too late for us to undertake to retrace their steps and correct that error. I trust the necessity will never arise when anybody will ever propose the application of any further compulsion by national authority upon the institutions of the States of this Union.

If that error had not been committed; if in 1865 Congress had required as a condition of the readmission of the rebel States that they should establish systems of free schools, and had appropriated, if necessary, one, two, three hundred million dollars to aid them in that establishment, in my judgment the question of the perpetuity of the Union, the question of the attachment of any portion of its people to our institutions, would have been long ago settled. You would have had to-day voting in these States, of both races and both political parties, a generation of instructed and educated children, who themselves, and their parents and friends, would feel that they owed their education and elevation in life to the wisdom and policy of the national Government.

That opportunity has passed away. The only opportunity left to us is to encourage as far as we can the establishment of such institutions in the States themselves, by the devotion of some portion of the resources of the General Government to the accomplishment of that result. I do not propose at this time to go over the statistics upon this question, which I have heretofore and with great care collected and presented to Congress and to the public, of the early legislation of this country on this subject. Nothing is better established by the precedents of our legislation than the propriety of the application of the proceeds of our public lands to purposes of education.

When Virginia made that magnificent gift of her public lands to the nation in 1787, it was upon the express condition, imposed by her statesmen of that day, that in their management the encouragement of public schools and the education of the people should be kept specially in view. With the exception of recent gifts to railroads, every gift which has been made of those public lands, a certain number of sections to the new States on their admission into the Union, 5 per cent. of the proceeds of their sales, a large distribution for the purpose of encouraging agricultural and technical education—every disposition that has been made by the national authority of the public lands has been in that direction.

Accompanying the tables of the census of the United States is a picture more eloquent than any words. The Superintendent of the Census has accompanied the tables of population and wealth by two maps, one of which shows by difference of shades the portions of the country where education prevails and where illiteracy prevails, and the other shows the same thing in regard to wealth. And the same identical territory which in the one map appears black with ignorance, in the other shows black with poverty. The same territory which in the one appears white and pure as representing education, in the other appears white and pure as representing wealth.

Now there are two main objects which are intended to be reached by this bill. The first is to consecrate forever to the purpose of the education of the people this vast national domain, so far as it may be considered the property of the nation. Of course whatever policy may commend itself to Congress as necessary for furthering the interests of the settler, to that the legislation which treats of the public lands as mere property must give way. The interests of the great States which in the future are to cover this domain, the interests of the people that are to compose their population, must of course be paramount to every other interest whatever.

But at the present time the policy of the country is to sell for reasonable prices these lands, and the proceeds are received into the public Treasury. This bill proposes to make an annual distribution among the States of one-half of the amount of those proceeds, for the purpose of aiding in the endowment of public schools in the different States. It is proposed that for the first five years this distribution shall be made on the basis of illiteracy; that is, of the need of the particular States. It is true that this distribution will create a certain inequality among the States for the first five years. But I think every gentleman who remembers, looking now at the interests of his own State, that the vote of an illiterate and uneducated person in another State affects all national questions, affects the policy of the country as much as the vote of the most educated and instructed citizen of his own State; that the humble black laborer in the rice swamp by his vote affects the national policy of the country with exactly the same power that Agassiz, or Elliott, or Barnard does, will see that it is for the interest of each State that the distribution should be made for the present in proportion to the needs of the several States.

Heretofore, in discussing this question, I have presented to the House some statistics, with the view of showing the need of different States, growing out of the number of persons therein who are unable to read or write. When I presented those statistics some gentlemen, representing States where the number of illiterate was large, seemed to suppose that it was done for some purpose of exciting reproach against their States or of vaunting in some way the superiority of my own. Sir, it was with no such purpose that these statistics were presented to the attention of the House and of the country. I am perfectly aware that the State which I have the honor to represent, if it has any advantage in this respect over any other State, owes that advantage largely to its wealth, its compactness of population, and the length of time which it has been settled. And I am not here, in discussing a question of this kind, to make any claims to any special merit or credit on account of anything that may have been done by my people or by my forefathers in this respect. I am aware that other States, new, with populations scattered over a large territory, which have had, whether by their fault or the fault of others, the great burden of slavery, which have been devastated by war, have been unable, even if willing, to supply this want for themselves.

But I will beg of the representatives of the States now to be affected not to reject this olive-branch which is held out to them by the people of the wealthier and more-densely populated States, which offers them not merely national aid in the establishment of their institutions of education, but offers to give them for the first five years, subject to extension by Congress hereafter, if at the end of five years such a condition continues to exist, this great advantage in the distribution of a common fund.

I have prepared, and shall have printed as a part of my speech, a table showing the amount of the fund which will be received by different States under this distribution. Let me refer to the manner in which the distribution will operate as respects two or three States.

The whole net proceeds of the sale amount to about $2,000,000 annually. Of this sum one half is proposed to be distributed annually, while the other half is to constitute a permanent fund, the income of which shall be distributed in the same way. Under this distribution the State of Alabama, with a population of 996,992, would receive as its share of $1,000,000 the sum of $67,689.71, while the State of Connecticut, with a population of 537,454—a little more than half the population of Alabama—will receive only $5,234.03. The State of Kentucky, with a population of 1,321,011, would receive $58,705.46, while the State of Massachusetts, with a population of 1,457,351, would receive only $17,273.94.

I submit the table in detail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not fear to confront my constituents, and I do not believe that any man in this House, representing an intelligent and educated constituency, will hesitate to confront his constituents with the statement that he has consented to a distribution on this basis, unequal as it may seem to be. I do not believe that the intelligent constituency represented by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who sits near me, will be offended if every dollar of the proceeds of the public lands be devoted to increasing the intelligence of the ignorant classes in distant States. They know that the policy which is dear to them—that the national policy on which their prosperity depends—that their vast interests, commercial, manufacturing, mechanical, and educational—the administration of law, the recognition of human rights, the determination of their own fate and that of their children—depends largely on the intelligence and patriotism of the people of these illiterate States, and their capacity to understand public measures.

I admit that the method of education in Arkansas, for instance, the general control of the educational system there, should be determined by the people of that State alone. Massachusetts or Pennsylvania has no right under the Constitution, and should have no right under the Constitution, to interfere with any other State in these respects. But in the question whether Arkansas shall be educated, we, brethren of a common country, having one hope, one political faith, one political destiny, have an equal interest with the men who live within that locality. Therefore we propose simply to say to them, "If you desire to attempt to educate your people, to fit them, so far as education will do it, for the duties of American citizens, we will forego until you are equal with us in these respects any claim to a distribution of this public bounty founded on population, and will make the distribution to you according to your need."

We expect that Arkansas shall pay her share for maintaining the light-houses on the coast of Massachusetts, (that being a national interest,) although she may not have a light-house within her borders; and we are willing in our turn, so far as we constitutionally may, to pay our share according to the need, not according to the numbers, in furnishing these lights for the guidance of the people of any other community that may happen now to be in darkness.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill in its mechanism is exceedingly simple; but I believe (and in the expression of this belief I am fortified by the unanimous testimony of educators in all parts of the country) that its protection of the Government against the waste or misapplication of these funds is absolute and complete. It requires of the States just two conditions, and declares that every State which shall within one year comply with those two conditions shall, in the next year, receive its share of this distribution. Those two conditions are: first, the establishment of a system of free public schools for all its citizens, leaving all the details of that system to its own discretion; and, secondly, a report that it has established such a system, and that it has applied the money in accordance with the provisions of the bill, and a report of the number of children that have been in attendance at those schools during the previous year. A great many other conditions have been suggested as desirable to be added; but it seems to me that the performance of these conditions will be sufficient for the end proposed.

Many gentlemen say, "Why, how is it possible that a gift of $50,000 to a State of a million and a half of inhabitants, one-half of whom cannot read or write, can suffice to produce the result which this bill aims to accomplish?" But, Mr. Speaker, the history of education in this matter answers that question, and answers it to the surprise as well as the satisfaction of persons who have not previously investigated the subject. I am informed by the distinguished agent of the Peabody fund, Dr. Sears, perhaps the highest authority in this country on this special subject, that the expenditure of $30,000 a year from this fund (I believe that is the amount, though I may not have it precisely in my memory) causes probably an expenditure of from ten to twenty times that amount in the localities where this slight expenditure has been made; and not only that, but that the results proceed in a vastly increasing ratio. When you say to a town, or a parish, or a neighborhood, "We will give you $5,000 for the establishment of schools," not only is the proposition readily accepted—for any community dislikes to see such an offer go by unimproved—but every town or community within the circuit of forty miles around comes in and says, "Why can you not do the same for us?"

The bill contemplates that there shall be made to the General Government a report setting forth the number of schools in each State, and the number of pupils actually attending therein.

That list will be tabulated and reported to Congress, and the result will be if in any State it appears, either that the State has refused to get its share of the bounty of Congress, or that the State stands lowest in rank in these particulars which are reported, somebody in that State will set its rivers on fire until that state of things is changed. It was that stimulant, and that stimulant alone, giving a few dollars only to each town, by which Horace Mann created anew the common-school system of Massachusetts, and raised it from its degraded condition, thereby making his name immortal among the benefactors of mankind. On this point the authority of the various school superintendents as given by Dr. Sears, to which I have alluded, is decisive.

Then, Mr. Speaker, that will leave the other million dollars to be deposited in the national Treasury, and invested in Government bonds, the interest only to be distributed, leaving the principal to accumulate as a national educational fund.

It seems to my mind the vast public domain we are rapidly disposing of in one way or another ought not to be used up for the necessities of a single generation. The people of the country, and especially the laborers of the country, take a deep interest in the public lands. They will not consent to any disposition of the proceeds of the sale of these public lands; and this bill gives no public lands, but simply disposes of the proceeds of their sale when paid into the Treasury—they will not consent, I say, to the disposition of them to any purpose less sacred than that of the education of the people.

It does not seem just that the entire proceeds of this vast national heritage should be disposed of for the necessities of a single generation and nothing left for the future.

If this fund is once established by the national Government, I believe very large accretions will come to it from time to time from various other sources. The amount of private benefactions made for the purpose of education in this country is very large. Last year, such as could be gathered from the newspapers, and not including those benefactions made by contributions specifically to such benevolent societies as the American Missionary Association, amounted to over $10,000,000, and the previous year to over $3,000,000. A very large portion of these benefactions will, in the course of time, take the direction of this national educational fund, and will go, as they should go, to the benefit of common schools.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentlemen who are interested in the general objects of this bill will be kind enough to bear in mind that its details have been prepared with the very greatest care.

It has passed substantially one House of Representatives on a full debate, received the approbation of the President in his annual message in the fall of 1872, and, I believe, had the favor of a majority in the other branch of Congress.

Now a great many gentlemen will suggest various details which might be amended in order to satisfy them personally. Such amendments will, in my judgment, if adopted, seriously embarrass, and not facilitate, the passage of the bill itself. I do not disguise from any person that, although this bill declares it does not interfere, or pretend to interfere, with the right of Congress in the future to make any disposition of the public lands it may choose to make for agricultural colleges, or for any other purpose, and especially it does not undertake to affect the policy which Congress may adopt toward actual settlers—I do not disguise the fact that among the vast benefits of this legislation I reckon that it is to be a substantial and sufficient protection of our public lands in the future against wasteful or extravagant distribution. The railway speculator or fraudulent schemer who comes to Congress hereafter, however specious his claims may be, demanding a portion of these public lands, is to be, and should be, encountered by the argument that what he demands is so far to diminish the school fund which the nation has set apart for this special purpose. And I do not expect the vote of any gentleman for this measure who prefers a disposition of the public property of that kind to the accomplishment of the end which this bill undertakes.

We have been specially pressed to divert this endowment, in whole or in part, to the benefit of agricultural colleges or technical colleges, which the country feels the need of, and which have been largely, in many of the States, endowed by public liberality. Many excellent and admirable persons, for whose judgment I have the highest respect, desire to make this endowment for technical education. They would double the entire grant made by the legislation of 1863 to agricultural colleges, or other institutions for applied science. Now I will yield to none of those gentlemen in my deep sense of the fact that the success of the industries of this country, both agricultural and manufacturing—if we are to compete with Europe in the great strife for supplying the markets of the world—lies in instruction in these applied sciences. Human muscle and human brain, without the control of the forces which science is developing, will no longer win the race, either in agricultural or mechanical competition. I have given a good part of some of the best years of my life to the study of the systems of technical education in existence in this and other countries, and have helped to wake up the people of my own State to a sense of this necessity. And I declare, as the result of all, that the true benefactor of the agricultural college, the true benefactor of the technical school to-day, is not he who increases its pecuniary endowment, but he who supplies it with a universal and elevated system of common-school education from which it can select its pupils.

The manufacturers of England, disgraced in the competition with Europe in the world's fair of 1867, went home mortified and ashamed to establish the system of technical education which France, Prussia, and Switzerland, and even Austria, have established, in order that they might be able to sell the products of their manufacturing skill in the markets of the world. In 1851, at the world's fair, out of one hundred branches England led the manufacturers of the world in ninety. In 1867, out of the same one hundred divisions, England led the manufacturers of the world in but ten. The difference was occasioned by the establishment of technical schools on the continent by France, Austria, Prussia, and Switzerland. Then she set about to remedy that evil. Parliament appointed a commission. Boards of trade all over England and her men of science met in conventions. Her manufacturers petitioned Parliament and gave liberally of their own funds. But England found that it was impossible to establish a system of technical education until she first established her system of common schools, and the common-schools act of 1870, introduced by Mr. Forster, who is the coming man in the liberal party of England, is due not to England's sense of the claims of the manhood of her people—not primarily or chiefly due to that—but is due to the necessity, first, of technical education for the success of her manufacturers, and, next, of a good and thorough system of common-school education, from which the pupils in technical schools can be drawn and can be devoted to the particular branches for which their circumstances or capacities render them fit.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I for one set my face resolutely against any attempt to endow an agricultural college, however much I may desire its prosperity; against any attempt to endow the technical school for manufactures or the technological institution for scientific men, however much I may be sensible of their value to this country, until first the common schools, on which alike the political future and the political prosperity of this country, and the success and value of these institutions for technical education themselves are to depend, are amply provided for.

Another thing I would say. Technical education will always find sufficient benefactors. The wealthy mechanic, the wealthy merchant, likes to devote the proceeds of his life's industry to the university. He does not give it to the common schools. And these technical schools to-day in my State, where our system of common-school education ranks respectably, to say the least, with that of other States, are needing, not the opening of the purses of her men of wealth, to endow professorships and laboratories, so much as the exalting in the common school of the standard of education afforded there, so that the pupil in the technical school at sixteen or seventeen may begin sufficiently advanced in his acquirements to be in three or four or five years rendered competent to apply science to agriculture or the mechanical arts.

Mr. Speaker, I trust that this measure may find favor with the House. I trust that it may be in the beginning of this new session and this new administration the key-note of its policy; that, turning aside from the disgraceful jangle, from the personal taunt, from the confession of past weakness, this House may address itself without distinction of party to a measure so well calculated to elevate the character of our people.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to conclude this brief exposition of the bill by quoting the weighty admonition of a distinguished citizen of my own State, who gave his life to this work:

> In our country, and in our times, no man is worthy the honored name of statesman who does not include the highest practicable education of the people in all his plans of administration. He may have eloquence, he may have a knowledge of all history, diplomacy, jurisprudence, and by them he might claim, in other countries, the elevated rank of a statesman; but unless he speaks, plans, labors at all times and in all places for the culture and education of the whole people, he is not, he cannot be, an American statesman.

Mr. MONROE. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts takes his seat I desire to ask him to explain somewhat a proposition he laid down, and which I have heard a number of gentlemen inquire about. He was understood to say that illiteracy is on the increase in the country, and many gentlemen seem to question that statement.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio I will say, that I made inquiry of the Commissioner of Education, and of several other gentlemen who have been conversant with the educational position of the Southern States, both in official capacities and as personally interested, and every one of them to whom I have put the question agrees in saying that although, as I said before, the public sentiment enlisted in those States was hopeful, and such improvement in the future might be expected, yet, with the conspicuous and honorable exception of the State of Virginia, the actual number of pupils at schools and the actual provision of public schools had diminished within the last three years.

Mr. HEREFORD. I hope the gentleman will exclude West Virginia from that statement. Her population is less than five hundred thousand, yet she devotes $600,000 annually to educational purposes.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should be very glad if every gentleman in the House should be able to rise and show me that in regard to his State this statement is an error. As I said before, I can prove the statement which I make, but I can prove it simply by a review of the legislation of the States, of the statistics, of the reports of public meetings, and by the certificates of conspicuous persons in various States. If I undertake to do it, however, gentlemen will suppose that I do it for the purpose of hostile criticism upon their States, or for the purpose of asserting the superiority of particular States in this regard. I did it to some extent in the last Congress, but I purposely refrained to-day from showing statistics to the House to prove that fact, saying to them that after a very full and careful study of the matter, I believe that statement is true. But, of course, the correctness of my statement in this particular is not essential or important to the strength of my general argument.

Mr. MELLISH. I want to know what are the reasons why the General Government should give aid to the common schools which are under the charge of the States, and if it will not be likely to have the effect of inducing the States to reduce their taxation for educational purposes to the extent of this grant? Is it not in reality a gratuity?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not think it will have that effect. Some of the States are really unable to make as ample provision for educational purposes as they desire to do. In answer to the first part of the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MELLISH,] I will say that this has been the policy of the Government since its foundation. The State of Virginia, in the first grant of public lands to the nation by which it acquired all the public lands it then possessed, declared that the express purpose of the grant was that the lands should be devoted to educational purposes. I have before me a list of thirty or forty acts, from the administration of Washington down to the present time, in which this policy has been recognized. It is too late for any gentleman conversant with the history of the country to ask why the national Government should undertake to stimulate institutions of education among the people. Some persons go further, and claim not only the right but the duty of the Federal Government, in the absence of an efficient system of education in a State, to exercise, control, and provide for the establishment of such a system. This bill makes no such claim; it contemplates no such measure; it is simply to give to the common schools the aid which the Government has given to other means of education. The need of the country to-day is public schools.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts if he has calculated how much, under this bill, would go to the various States during the first year?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir; I have a table here, a portion of which I read.

Mr. COX. It must be an interesting table. Has the gentleman calculated how much the amount would be per capita?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have the table here. I read from it in regard to several States, and I said that I would read the figures in regard to any State that any gentleman desired to hear read.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. This bill provides that for five years the proceeds of the public lands shall be distributed among the States in proportion to their illiteracy. Why not make it perpetual?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The reason was, that many gentlemen doubted about the adoption of this principle as a permanent policy of this Government. They said that after these States had had this benefit and had got established on an equality with other States in this particular, it would not be just to offer a premium on continuing illiterate in the future; and it seemed to me, therefore, that the wisest way was to fix the policy of the Government in this particular for this short period, leaving it to the future to determine what is just and necessary hereafter.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make some remarks upon this bill, but shall not long occupy the attention of the House. I think there are very grave questions involved in the measure—some that we ought not to forget or overlook in the discussion of it. While it is not agreeable for me ever to vote against any measure that looks toward public free schools, yet I am constrained to present a few considerations in opposition to the passage of this bill, and give some of the reasons why I shall vote against it. In the first place, it is a new departure; it is the adoption of a new policy—a policy which has never hitherto been pursued since the formation of the Government. Ever since there have been public schools in any State of the Union, those public schools have relied wholly and entirely on State support and State appropriations. Never before has a direct attempt been made to go to the Treasury of the United States and take out money and parcel it among the several States for educational purposes. I have, sir, in past years of my life, had some little connection with public education, and I have been a firm believer that that kind of interest which is needed for a happy, full, and successful development of the common-school system must be close at home.

It is utterly impossible to rely upon the General Government to foster and keep alive that kind of spirit that is needed for a successful free-school development; and most certainly I do not think we should go to the Treasury this year—and I say this to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES]—to a Treasury well-nigh depleted, and take out of it the sum of $3,000,000 and scatter it through the Union, even for so good a purpose as free education.

Mr. MAYNARD. Only $2,000,000; the net proceeds.

Mr. DUNNELL. The net proceeds last year were about $3,000,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. No.

Mr. DUNNELL. Well, say $2,000,000. Here I might stop and remark that that is probably the largest annual sum that ever will be for distribution, and that hereafter the sum will certainly be diminished, and very rapidly, and that in a few years we will have very little money derived from this source to give, even for this laudable purpose.

Now, my great objection to this bill lies in this: what are these public lands of ours which we propose practically to tax in order that we may get money, and get "net proceeds," wherewith to pay out and create this fund? We must recollect that we will get no "net proceeds" unless we tax these lands. We have had a great deal said here about these lands belonging to the people. If these lands are to be taxed in order that we may get a fund that shall be worthy of the name, who are to be taxed?

We have two policies: the homestead and the pre-emption policy. Where do we get the most of the proceeds of our public lands? We get them under the operation of the pre-emption law. Both Houses of Congress, however, at the last session, voted to repeal the pre-emption laws, and henceforth and forever open up the entire public domain to the homestead principle. The homestead principle has been adopted by both of the great national parties of the country; it is the popular sentiment of the country to-day. Nor is it proposed insidiously to keep on the statute-book a pre-emption law that shall give us "net proceeds." Without that law we shall have only the income that shall arise from the sale of the mineral and pine lands, and very few of these now remain. Therefore I say that, as legislators here, we ought to remember that these public lands are, as it were, our outlying opportunities for national development. What are we going to do with the poor man coming over from Europe to settle in this country? Whither shall we direct him? We wish to direct him to the great prairies—the public lands of the West. Shall we tell these men that these lands are open to be entered under the homestead law? Yes. We should let that word go to Europe in advance, and let the people there understand that this is our policy. But pass this bill, and its friends will inevitably, naturally, and logically oppose the repeal of the pre-emption laws.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman——

Mr. DUNNELL. No; not now.

Then you must inform every person in the East, in the older States, who desires a home in the West, every incoming settler upon our public domain, that he must pay $1.25 or $2.50 an acre. Will it pay thus to burden the public lands? I say not. We will be taxing those who are the poorest and yet the best people in the country; we will be taxing the men who wish a home, the poor men who come into the country; for unless we sell them these lands we will get no "net proceeds."

The Committee on the Public Lands has already before it a bill to repeal the pre-emption law. It ought to be repealed. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] talked about speculators. Sir, where does the speculator in public lands get the chance to defraud and carry on his business? It is under that identical pre-emption law. Abolish that, and every man may have a free home. Give us the homestead law alone. The pre-emption is where the fraud comes in; it is where the fearful swearing takes place; it is where the speculator thrives and flourishes.

I say that we need these public lands for national development. We must increase our national population. Whither shall the hundreds of thousands go who come here? They must go out on the prairies of the West. We must amend the timber act of last session, so that the prairies of the West may be made timber lands, and must encourage the cultivation of forests upon these prairies. Then, with the rich soil that God gave us, with the good climate that there prevails, which will be vastly improved by forest culture, they will furnish homes for millions on millions. Let us not, I say, tie up these public lands by this kind of legislation.

I sympathize with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.] I know his heart is all right; it is nearer right in this instance than his head. He feels an interest that I feel, and have felt for years—a profound interest in public education. But this is not the way to accomplish it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether that interest did not lead him to make a very earnest and eloquent speech in favor of this very bill last winter?

Mr. DUNNELL. No, sir; it did not.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. You voted for it.

Mr. DUNNELL. This identical bill has not been before the House and passed upon.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes; the only difference between the bill the gentleman voted for and spoke for last winter and this bill is that this makes the basis of illiteracy last for five years and the other for ten.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think there was a very great difference.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what the difference was?

Mr. DUNNELL. I cannot now state the difference.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Then I presume that if this bill made the basis of illiteracy ten years, instead of five, the gentleman would make an eloquent speech in its favor.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, since the other bill was before the House I have had a full year in which to note the practical operations of the pre-emption law—a year of valuable observation from the locality in which I live; and I am willing that the experiences of a year shall modify or change my action upon this or any other subject. I have, within the year, had peculiar opportunities to observe the practical operation of the pre-emption law; and therefore I believe that these public lands should be kept for the settlers of the country; that they ought not to be squandered or disposed of in the way here proposed.

One word further and I shall sit down. The friends of this measure have deluded themselves with the belief that they were to receive from it a very large sum of money—a very large fund. I fancy that this fund, for the entire country, would not exceed $10,000,000. Divide the interest on these $10,000,000 among all the States of the Union, and the amounts would be so insignificant that in many instances they would be frittered away and never made of any practical value to the particular localities. It is practically to be taken from the Territories of the country and distributed in sections where, if there are to be public systems of education, the seeds must be sown by themselves, and a public sentiment must spring up and grow which shall support schools by voting the necessary taxation.

If the people of North Carolina, or of Georgia, are ever to have public schools, they must have them as the result of local legislation, local home sentiment and conviction. We cannot force an educational system upon them. It is vain for us here in Congress to expect to legislate schools into existence in the various States of the Union.

I yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy some little time on this subject; and it is now about the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. COX. I will make a motion to adjourn if the gentleman will yield.

In the thirteenth line of the fourth section strike out "five" and insert "ten;" so that the proviso will read thus:

Provided, however, That for the first ten years the distribution of the said fund to and among the several States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, shall be made according to the numbers of their respective population of ten years old and upward who cannot write, as shown, from time to time, by the last preceding published census of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had his attention called to the fact that the transcript of the record in the Don Carlos Buell case, transmitted by the Secretary of War, is very voluminous, and it has been suggested that it had better be referred without any order to print, leaving it to the committee to have it ordered to be printed if they so desire.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course power is left with the committee to order it to be printed, if they shall deem it necessary.

He also presented additional papers in the case of John Hannegan, for himself and as administrator of the estate of William Hannegan, deceased, praying compensation for damages which accrued under a certain contract; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a memorial of business men in the city of Saint Paul, Minnesota, in which they say that, approving the principle of the bankrupt law of the 2d of March, 1867, that the estate of an insolvent debtor should, by law, uniform throughout the United States, be divided equally among the creditors of the insolvent; and believing that a uniform rule should exist throughout the whole country for the prevention of frauds upon and preferences among creditors in cases of insolvency; and that a like uniform rule should prevail by which an honest insolvent may obtain a discharge from his debts; and while agreeing that in a number of its provisions the law ought to be amended so that the period of delinquency of payment of commercial paper shall be longer than fourteen days, as now, before a debtor can be subject to an appeal of the creditor to the bankrupt courts, and that it shall require the demand and consent of at least one-third, or some similar proportion (in amount) of the creditors, before the courts shall be at liberty to grant an order in bankruptcy, they respectfully remonstrate against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law, and pray Congress to take action for the amendment of the same as above suggested, and also by a reduction of present charges. This memorial is signed by a great number of the principal business men of the State of Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee having reported on that subject, the memorial will lie on the table.

Mr. KELLY presented a petition of officers of the State Temperance Union, State Temperance Alliance, Grand Lodge of Good Templars, and Father Mathew Temperance Society of the State of Oregon, praying for the appointment of a commission concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of Italians, now citizens of the United States, assembled in different associations at New York, in which they represent that being fully convinced of the existence of the inhuman traffic in Italian children, an evil which no lover of freedom can contemplate unmoved, and heartily sympathizing with Italian citizens in their efforts to emancipate from unjust and tyrannical rule these unfortunate children, and fully concurring with the sentiments expressed in the resolutions hereto annexed, they respectfully petition Congress to pass the necessary laws for the suppression of this disgraceful abuse. There is a bill on this subject already pending before the Judiciary Committee, introduced by me on the first day of the session, and I move that this petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. The president of the National Board of Trade has forwarded to me memorials of that body adopted and directed at their recent session in Chicago to be prepared and presented to Congress. One is a memorial calling attention to existing laws requiring bonds of exporters of spirituous and malt liquors, to the impolicy and doubtful constitutionality of imposing an internal-revenue tax on exported articles, and to the diversity of construction of these laws in different districts by the revenue officials, and praying for such legislation as will remove and remedy the evils suggested and complained of. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I present another memorial of the same body—the National Board of Trade—representing that no part of the quarantine laws of our sea-ports can be effective against the importation of diseases without uniformity in time and method, and praying for the establishment of a uniform system of quarantine under national supervision. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present the memorial of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Samuel W. Crawford, of the United States Army, on the retired list, praying for the passage of a special act retiring him upon the rank which he held at the time he received his wound in battle by reason of which he was retired, thus placing him upon an equality with the officers who have heretofore been retired under the act of Congress. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Isaac Wilson and 92 other citizens of Georgetown, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of D. Minor K. Johnson, of Rome, New York, and other gentlemen, comprising apparently the entire bar of that city, asking the unconditional repeal of the bankrupt law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be laid upon the table, the committee having reported upon that subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I also present a petition signed by business men in the city of Rochester, New York, praying that the bankrupt law be amended rather than repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a similar memorial, signed by citizens of the State of New York, residents of Syracuse. Perhaps, Mr. President, in presenting these memorials preferring the amendment rather than the repeal of the bankrupt law, I ought to state that sometimes a circular comes to me with these memorials, not, I suppose, intended as a part of them; but as it is inclosed with them I think perhaps I should bring it to the attention of the Senate—a circular which, it seems, is sent out with these printed petitions from gentlemen—registers and others—calling upon those to whom they are sent to circulate and obtain subscriptions to them, and calling also for contributions to defray the expense of sending persons to Washington to oppose the repeal of the bankrupt law. As, I say, I cannot think this circular is intended as a part of these memorials, but as it comes in one instance this morning in the same envelope with the memorial, although I do not present it, I think it may be right to call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark right there in connoction with these memorials?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator from New York has called the attention of the Senate to the fact mentioned by him, I desire to say a word in regard to it. I have received a blank petition sent to me by a gentleman who was formerly an officer under the bankrupt law, but is not now. Presuming that he was still an officer under the bankrupt law and would take a great deal of interest in it, certain parties sent him one of these blank memorials. Having read one of those that have been presented heretofore, I find that they are the same as this blank memorial against the repeal of the bankrupt law; and with it was a circular of the same character as the one that the Senator from New York alludes to, I presume. I will take the pains to read it to the Senate. Here it is:

NEW YORK, December 26, 1873.

DEAR SIR: We inclose herewith blank memorials remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt act, with the request that, if consistent with your views, you will have the same signed by the business men of your place, so far as possible, and forward at once to your Senator or Representative in Congress. A strong lobby is at work in Washington in favor of absolute repeal—

All of which we know is not true—but if the business men of the country in favor of the law will act promptly, it is believed that the law will be amended, and not repealed.

It has been thought necessary to send persons to Washington to oppose the repeal as soon as Congress reassembles; and, as expense will be incurred for this purpose, for printing, &c., any contribution you may feel inclined to send to Aaron Smith & Co., treasurers, 20 Warren street, New York, will be thankfully received, duly acknowledged, and judiciously and properly expended.

Very truly, yours,

EASTMAN, BIGELOW & DAYTON, 425 Broadway,
CHAS. M. DICKINSON, 289 Broadway,
LUKE A. LOCKWOOD, 110 Broadway, Committee.

I merely call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the shysters who practice under this bankrupt law, and make their money by black-mailing men, have organized to oppose the repeal of the law, and are sending these circulars to every person in the United States connected with the administration of the law as an officer, and asking him to have these petitions signed and sent here to members of Congress as showing the sentiment of the country against repeal. On comparing this blank petition with other petitions that I see members have presented here in opposition to the repeal of the bankrupt act, I find that they are the same, which proves to me that a majority of these petitions were gotten up in this way, and presented here to show a sentiment of the country that is not really the sentiment of the people of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to say that I presented a memorial yesterday from the very first business men of the city of Providence, and I have information from there since I arrived here that corresponds with what I obtained when I was there, that no commercial question ever received so unanimous a judgment in the community which I have the honor in part to represent as that does, and there were no shysters concerned in getting up that memorial.

Mr. CAMERON. What was that?

Mr. ANTHONY. Against the repeal of the bankrupt law.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the Senate will understand that I do not make this remark applicable to all the petitions presented. I only say that the printed blank I have presented is a copy of some of the petitions that have been presented here, which shows that these gentlemen are circulating these petitions in blank, sending them to officers under the bankrupt law to get them signed, and then sent here to show the sentiment of the country. That does not prove that all the petitions are of that kind, but it does prove that a portion of them are. That is what I mean.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think this is a very proper course to be taken by officers under the bankrupt act; not that they have not a right, as any other citizens, to send petitions here, or procure petitions in a proper manner to be sent here; but so far as their sending out petitions in this way to be signed is concerned, they have a very strong precedent, which perhaps they followed. The Senator from Illinois will recollect that not a great while ago one of the Departments of this Government sent out thirty-odd thousand blank petitions, printed and circulated at the public expense, to officers of the Government of the United States, instructing them to procure signatures to them, and send them to Congress, asking for a repeal of the franking privilege. With such a precedent as that before us, and which never invoked the condemnation of the Senate, these poor registers may think that they ought to be allowed this privilege.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Ohio, and for the information of the Senate, that at the time those petitions were presented to Congress, although the gentleman who did that agreed with me in politics, I denounced it at the very time.

Mr. THURMAN. That is very true.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, nobody can deny that among business men of the highest character there is a very general judgment that the bankrupt law ought to be amended rather than repealed; and even in speaking of the circular which he held in his hand, the Senator from Illinois, had he known personally some of these gentlemen, would except them from the remark he made. Interested they are, but men of character they are, also; and as it is common for men to act in the pursuit of their own interest, particularly when they think their interest tallies with right and expediency, these gentlemen, no doubt, are moving in this direction, and they have sent, as both these Senators remark, very wide-spread over the country, prepared and printed petitions; and, as we all know, that fact must be taken in derogation of the force of these petitions.

Those who are opposed to the bankrupt law, who are in favor of its unconditional repeal, move spontaneously in a sense. There is nobody at large interested in an organized movement for the repeal of the bankrupt law. Particular men may be interested; they may move in their neighborhood; but we can all see that the organized movement on this subject of course comes from those who have and naturally take an interest on their own behalf.

Now, Mr. President, as illustrating somewhat the diversity of views which prevails on this subject, since this debate sprang up I have received, and ask leave now to present, a memorial signed by citizens of the city in which I live. I know who they are. It is signed by an array of men such as have very seldom, I venture to say, united in any single judgment upon a public question. I find here the names of men of both political parties; I find the judges of the supreme court of the State; the judge of the court of appeals who lives in that city; Mr. Kernan, the recent democratic candidate for governor of the State, who is one of the leading lawyers; and the bar and business community with almost absolute unanimity, demanding in earnest terms the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law, and upon a judgment which unquestionably is their own, unprompted by anybody; and this petition, I venture to say, represents as fully as any petition containing no greater number of names the enlightened public judgment on this question. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Bishop E. L. Janes, Rev. Cyrus D. Foss, D. D., Rev. Mansfield French, and 40 other clergymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church of New York City and vicinity, praying for the appointment of a commission to make inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of the Green Point Presbyterian church, of Brooklyn, New York; signed by Rev. William Howell Taylor, pastor, J. N. Stearns, and Charles Kennedy, officers, praying for the appointment of a commission to make inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Caleb Clothier and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Boynton, and other officers of the church, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Joanna W. Turner, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Marimon and other citizens of Kentucky, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Brooklyn, New York, signed by Professor D. H. Cochran, president, and William M. Martin, secretary, and representing five thousand members, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LEWIS presented the petition of Joseph Segar and Caleb C. Willard, praying compensation for a hotel alleged to have been seized by the military authority of the United States at Old Point Comfort, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 82) for the relief of Margaret E. West, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Oliver Powers, representing that he was marked upon the roll of Company K, Tenth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, as a deserter, and praying to have the roll of the company corrected, and pay, bounty, and other emoluments accorded to him, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 260) in regard to the retirement of Brevet Major-General S. W. Crawford; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 261) for the benefit of those purchasing lands from the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHURZ asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 262) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers relative to the case now on the files of the Senate, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FENTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 263) for the relief of the executors of Benjamin Brittin, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 264) for the relief of the officers of the Fourth and Fifth Indian Regiments; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 265) to establish the Corcoran Park and Zoological Garden near the Capitol, in the District of Columbia, and to incorporate a society to maintain the same, and a company to construct a street railroad thereto; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENCROACHMENTS UPON INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in his possession relative to the unauthorized occupation or invasion of, or encroachment upon, the Indian territory, so called, by individuals or bodies of men, in violation of treaty stipulations.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further Senate resolutions, the unfinished business of yesterday, being the salary bill, so called, is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. PRATT to the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to have that amendment reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment; which was to insert at the end of line 10 of the amendment of the committee the following:

Provided, however, That the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress who have received their compensation since the 4th day of March, 1873, at the rate of $7,500 per year, in accordance with the act of March 3, 1873, shall hereafter be paid only such monthly installments as shall, in the aggregate, make their compensation for the whole Congress equal to the sum of $5,000 per year, exclusive of mileage allowances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the vote is taken on this amendment I beg to suggest to my good friend from Indiana, inasmuch as he must be satisfied that there are members of the Senate who will vote against his amendment who are in favor of it upon principle, and yet vote against it because they are satisfied that it attempts to reach an end in a manner not contemplated or warranted by the Constitution, and as he has prepared an amendment which will reach the end perhaps in a more acceptable manner, to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment, let us take a vote upon it at once, and he can then offer the other amendment, and have the yeas and nays upon that.

Mr. PRATT. I am satisfied to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. LOGAN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objects. The Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Hamlin, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Schurz, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Crozier, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamiliton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, and Wright—45.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Anthony, Chandler, Edmunds, Gordon, Johnston, Jones, Patterson, Robertson, Sprague, Stockton, and West—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRATT. I now offer the following amendment to come in at the conclusion of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee:

Provided, however, That the compensation of the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress shall be at the rate of $7,500 a year for the year ending March 3, 1874, and shall be at the rate of $2,500 for the year ending March 3, 1875, exclusive of mileage as fixed above.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOGY. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, the members of the Forty-third Congress will get $7,500 a year up to the 3d of March next, and mileage.

Mr. PRATT. I did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOGY. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, the Senators and Representatives of the Forty-third Congress will for the first year of the Congress be entitled to $7,500 and mileage.

Mr. PRATT. And mileage as fixed by the act to which this proviso is attached—I mean, as fixed in the substitute which was reported by the committee.

Mr. BOGY. As I understand the import of the words, the members of the Forty-third Congress for the first year of the present Congress will be entitled to $7,500 as a compensation, and in addition to a full mileage.

Mr. PRATT. That is the meaning of the proviso, certainly—mileage as it is fixed in the bill reported by my friend from Iowa.

Mr. BOGY. As I understand the amendment, the gentleman has changed his position very radically on the subject. Instead of being for a small pay he is now for a larger pay than has yet been proposed in this body, because we should get the mileage and the $7,500 also, under his amendment, for the first year.

Mr. PRATT. That is precisely what the bill reported by the committee of this body makes provision for.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the mover of this proposition whether it is to follow line 10 of the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. PRATT. The amendment is to come in at the end of the first section of the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. It comes at the end of the first section of the substitute. Then I ask the attention of the Senator while I read that provision as it would stand:

That so much of the act, &c., be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and that the salary and compensation of all said persons shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of this act:—

That is, for members $5,000 a year, mileage, and so on—

Provided, however, That the compensation of the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress shall be at the rate of $7,500 for the year ending March 3, 1874, and shall be at the rate of $2,500 for the year ending March 3, 1875, exclusive of mileage as fixed above.

Mr. PRATT. "Mileage as fixed above." That is the section to which this is an amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I inquire of the Senator whether the effect of this provision will not be that we now enact that for this year every Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be paid $7,500 and mileage?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; I suppose so.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I should like to inquire from some gentleman who comes from the Pacific coast—my friend from Oregon if he will be kind enough to tell me—what is the mileage from the city of Portland, Oregon, for example, to the city of Washington?

Mr. KELLY. The mileage for the session, coming and returning, is sixteen hundred and twenty-three dollars and some cents.

Mr. CONKLING. Stationery and newspaper money added to that will amount to nearly $2,000. Then it is proposed that we shall vote that some members of this body shall be paid this year at the rate of ninety-five or ninety-six hundred dollars, and that other members shall be paid in less degree all the way down to a minimum of somewhere near $8,000. I hardly think that this amendment is the idea with which my honorable friend from Indiana began.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is very easy to compute the saving in this matter. It is true that the United States will pay out more this year under the proposed amendment, to the extent of the mileage for one session, but the United States will save $5,000 on every Senator and Member next year. It is a very simple proposition. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Indiana is perfectly constitutional. There is no trouble in voting upon it on that ground. We have the right to fix the salary at $2,500 if we choose to do so. The purpose in fixing it at $2,500 for the next year is to draw back money that members have received under the law. I can stand it to live next year on a salary of $2,500, if the rest of the Senators can; and if there is really a desire in Congress to get back into the Treasury the money that has been received during the year thus far accrued in excess of the old salary, this is the way to do it, and I am rather disposed to vote for this amendment. I do not think it is right; I think it is a device to get back into the Treasury money which we have received under the law. That is all there is of it; and no one would seriously, as a separate and distinct measure, propose to fix the salaries of members of Congress at $2,500 a year, just about the compensation of a fourth-class clerk in the Treasury Department; but still if there is a desire here to fix the salary next year at $2,500, I can stand it.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator think that the effect of this amendment would be, in the case of every Senator who may hereafter come into the Senate before the close of this Congress, to take from him to replenish the Treasury for whatever any sitting member may have unjustly taken since the commencement of the Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; and I have no doubt about the power of Congress to do a great many unjust things. There is no doubt that this is unjust. It is unjust to us.

Mr. HOWE. But the Senator is willing to vote for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to vote for it in deference to a desire to economize. I am determined to economize at this session of Congress, and I am disposed to strike at everything that will reduce the expenses of the Government; and as this is a proposition now that we shall serve during the next year for $2,500, just about one-half of what I consider a fair compensation, and as I expect during this session to vote against every appropriation that can possibly be got along without in order to avoid levying taxes, I shall commence by voting for this proposition to surrender one-half of what I consider our fair and reasonable compensation.

Mr. CRAGIN. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio before he takes his seat to explain to me the difference between this amendment and the one which we have just voted down.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difference so far as the result is concerned; but the other was unconstitutional in form, in my judgment. Senators differed with me in that, and I have no comment to make upon it. But this accomplishes by indirection, in the exercise of a power that we clearly have, the same result.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before I answer any other question I desire to say now that Senators must see that to push these amendments and enter into this contest is likely to put this bill just where it was left in the House, and compel us to go over the ground again. I do hope that in a grave deliberative body like this, where we ought to legislate with calmness and discretion, we shall avoid constant embarrassing amendments on collateral matters of this kind. Now I will hear my friend from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The question I desire to ask the Senator is, whether he is satisfied that this amendment will produce this effect, namely, to put back into the Treasury of the United States what may have been taken, or what is assumed by the bill to have been taken, as an excess of prospective pay—whether it does precisely that, nothing more and nothing less?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it does. That is, it compels members of Congress after the 4th of March, 1874, to serve for $2,500, to punish them for having served for $7,500 during the current year. That is the long and short of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In other words, it is a provision for restoring to the Treasury the excess between $5,000 and $7,500 received under the act of March 3 last. If that is precisely the amendment—and I am not sure whether it is or not—I am disposed to vote for it.

I am disposed to go a farther step. If anybody shall offer such an amendment, (for I do not intend to be officious in this matter,) I am disposed to go one step farther, and to take from the salaries of members of the Senate the back pay—the pay relating to the last Congress—and to say that whoever has got that, or has received that and disposed of it for his own advantage, cannot properly, in logic or in law, on the principle of this legislation, retain that. He ought to serve his country long enough without salary till that portion of the compensation has been refunded. If we intend to be thorough about this business it is idle to put three or four thousand dollars, or whatever it was, of the pay of the last Congress into our pockets, and then say that we return this; and it is just as illogical in my judgment to go back to the increase of last session and hold on to the prospective increase. It is all just one proposition. The increase of salaries was just a single proposition of increase of compensation to members of Congress; and we who were here—Senators—and accepted the increase that came to us as members of the Forty-second Congress, received it as a compensation in morals, in logic, and in law, precisely as we have been receiving it since the 4th of March last.

Now, I am disposed to go for a proposition which covers the whole question, if we can get at it. I shall vote for this amendment, if it is what the Senator from Ohio thinks it to be.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have said nothing on this subject, and I intend to say only a word now. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that he can live next year on $2,500, which I do not question. There may be a number of Senators that can do the same. But is my friend entirely certain that it would be convenient for all of his associates (some of whom may not have his means) to receive only $2,500 next year; and is the fact that he can live with a salary of $2,500 a proper consideration why he should vote for this amendment, and thus inconvenience his associates?

Mr. President, those who have received their pay at the rate of $7,500 since the 4th of March received it lawfully. They had a right to spend it; they have spent it; and it seems to me it would be most unreasonable to say that the members of the Senate, each and every one of them, no matter what their means are, shall be compelled to live on $2,500 next year. Sir, the American people do not expect any such legislation from us. We underrate their intelligence, we underrate their sense of justice if we think they do.

Further, Mr. President, I opposed the law proposed to be repealed when it was before the Senate last March. I opposed it on principle, because we were changing an executed contract. We had served through the whole Congress at $5,000 a year; and in the last hours of the Congress we were saying to the three or four hundred members of Congress, "If you will vote ay, each of you shall have $5,000 in your pocket, which you will not have if you vote no." It was bad legislation. It was an infringement of principle, because it was changing an executed contract. And what are we now asked to do? Why, the very same thing. After the money is due, has been received, been paid, and the contract executed, we are by legislation saying that the money shall be surrendered. Mr. President, I have no restitution to make; and I believe the people of my State would think less of me if I, by a voluntary humiliation, should here say, what is not true, that I have wronged the Treasury of the United States. I will not vote for the amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I have been faithfully following the lead of this committee for the purpose of repealing the salary bill of the last session, and I regret very much to hear my friend from Ohio, who sits by me, [Mr. SHERMAN,] announcing that, as one member of the committee, he is about to give way to an amendment which, whether intended to do so or not, will inevitably kill this bill.

The Senator from Ohio announces to us that it is not a measure simply for the purpose of fixing the compensation of members of Congress, but it is a penal statute; it is a punitive measure. He is to punish every member of Congress for having drawn at the rate of $7,500 a year since the 4th of March last, by compelling him to live on $2,500 for the next year; announcing that he can do so—with a very safe condition—if other Senators can; and, as my friend from New Jersey has intimated, there may be other Senators who will not be able to do so unless they can secure the indorsement on their notes of gentlemen who are able to do so.

Now, sir, suppose we put this amendment on as a punitive measure, what is the first thing that your attention is called to? It is this: you are going to punish men who had no part in the crime that you propose to punish. How many members came into the Senate on the 4th of March last? About twenty-two, or twenty-four perhaps, taking one-third of the number.

Mr. SPENCER. Sixteen.

Mr. SCOTT. Sixteen or eighteen at all events, who had not been in before. They had no part in the enactment of the salary law, and according to the construction given to it by the Senator from Ohio, we, who were here, whether we voted for it or not, whether we voted against it and spoke against it or not, whether we have received the money or not, are now to take part in punishing sixteen or eighteen of our colleagues for our own act.

Mr. LOGAN. And a majority of the House.

Mr. SCOTT. And probably a majority of the House, as the Senator from Illinois suggests. We are calling on our innocent colleagues to take part in the castigation which the public have been laying upon the backs of those who are guilty. That is magnanimous, certainly, to come from a member of the committee who have been invoking us to stand by them and repeal this law, and certainly more magnanimous with reference to two Senators, at least, who are to come in here in a few days, and who have got no part of the $7,500—one from California and one from Kansas; and we are to point to them as the black sheep of the next session, having $2,500 a year to live on. While the others who took part in what has been called a wrong have had their $7,500 for the year that is past, those who had no part in the offense at all come in during the next year and receive $2,500 as a punitive measure. They would feel good in drawing that $2,500, feeling all the time that it was the lash laid on them for the offenses of others, in which they had no part.

Mr. President, I have said that I received this money since the 4th of March last, and that, unless I am compelled to do it by way of some penal enactment or otherwise, I do not intend to pay it back. I voted against the measure of last session, as I said, because I believed the back pay to be a wrong; I believed the raising of the salary to be inexpedient; but when I was outvoted on that question, I did as the honorable Senator who now occupies the chair did—I drew the money promptly, and it has been spent faithfully; and unless this legislation compels me to pay it back I do not propose to do it; and I do not propose, moreover, to vote for amendments here which, as I have already said, whether intended to have that effect or not, will have the effect of preventing the repeal of the law, because the moment you get these amendments on, these injustices to which I have called attention must so shock every man's sense of propriety that he certainly cannot be a party in inflicting punishment upon men who are acknowledged to have had no part in the offense to be punished. I shall vote for the repeal of the law; but I shall vote against all amendments that are calculated to defeat that repeal.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, of the two amendments proposed by my colleague, the one that was voted down is the fair one, in my judgment, and is the one that gives equality; the other does not. The constitutional objection presented to the first amendment of my colleague I regard as having no foundation whatever. I have heard no argument that even raises a question in my mind in reference to its constitutionality. Its effect was to produce equality, and reference was had to what the member had received since the 4th of March simply for the purpose of making the payment in the future such that all the members would come out equal at the end of the year. Equality was the precise result of that amendment. But suppose it had not resulted in equality; Congress has a right to pay its members unequally; I have no doubt of that. There is no provision of the Constitution that requires our compensation to be the same, any more than there is a provision which requires a first or a second class clerk to be paid in the same way. It is perfectly constitutional for Congress to provide that a Senator entering upon a second or third term shall receive a higher compensation than one who just comes in. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he does not believe that it would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, if not of the letter?

Mr. MORTON. I do not, any further than the Constitution contemplates just enactments. I would not favor any proposition making inequality in the compensation of members; I would think it inexpedient, and I would think it unjust; but we all know that every unjust law is not unconstitutional. There is no sort of doubt about our power to do it, any more than there is to distinguish between the payment of one clerk who has served two years and another who has served five. The power is equally within this body. My friend from West Virginia can point to no clause of the Constitution that distinguishes this case from any other. So that, so far as the question of constitutional power is concerned, I put it out of the way entirely.

Now I come to the absolute injustice and absolute inequality of this amendment. How is it? We shall have two new members here from Kansas and California in the course of a few days, who have received no compensation since the 4th of March last, unless, indeed, my friend from Kansas [Mr. CROZIER] should be returned, and that will be agreeable to us all. But we will suppose that the Senator is to be a new man. We know there is a new man from California, and there may be another new man by the 4th of March, or immediately afterward. What is the effect of this amendment? That these new members, who have received nothing, who are responsible for nothing, who have committed no sin, are to receive but $2,500 for the next year that they are here—an absolute and downright injustice.

Mr. OGLESBY. Make an amendment in that respect.

Mr. MORTON. Make an amendment how? That amendment violates the supposed want of constitutional power. The first amendment was unjust, because it was said it was unconstitutional. Now, if you make an amendment to prevent increased compensation for the new members over and above what the others have, there you have the inequality again. You cannot do that, for the very same reason that Senators opposed the first amendment.

How is it as to the House of Representatives? There are always new members coming in there. Some resign; some die. The probability is that they will have a dozen new members in the House between this and the 4th of March, 1875, and they are to be paid $2,500 a year. If they had been here all the time to have received the large pay since the 4th of March last, and have had the benefit of it, they would be equal in the end; but they have not been here during that time; they are new members. They get only the small compensation, and are made to suffer because of those who got the large compensation since the 4th of March last.

I therefore oppose this amendment upon the ground of absolute injustice to new members. It will be a punishment to them for sins, if there be sins, that others have committed; and what is the ground? Upon the ground of a want of constitutional power to pass the first amendment offered by my colleague. I regard that ground as utterly without foundation. It is a mere method of complication.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend a question, with his permission.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. He voted for a proposition a moment ago that would give to a new Senator coming from Kansas $5,000 a year, and to himself $2,500 a year, because the new member, as a matter of course, would come in and get the old salary fixed by the law prior to 1873, $5,000 a year; while the Senator from Indiana, under the operations of the law, would get $2,500 a year. I ask the Senator if that is constitutional; and if it is constitutional, whether it is right, especially on the ground that old members ought to have a higher pay? I want to get the argument if I can.

Mr. MORTON. Why, sir, what is the effect of that? It is to make us all equal. We have been here since the 4th of March last. We have received the increased compensation. It is now proposed that our future compensation shall be adjusted with a view to what we have received since the 4th of March last, the effect of which will make us all come out evenly at $5,000 a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, if my friend will allow me, he proposes to take the $2,500 that is already ours, gone, spent, possessed, invested, to make good the pay for the next year; that is, he proposes to take our own money to pay us for future services.

Mr. MORTON. Not at all. What I mean to say is, that it is competent for this Congress to adjust the pay of my friend from Ohio so that he shall come out even, $5,000 a year, for this Congress, by putting as a debit upon his future pay what he has received in excess of the old pay since the 4th of March. Is there any doubt at all about that power? We cannot take from him what he has got. That is his private property. But we can say, in view of the fact that he has received a very large pay since the 4th of March last, that his pay from this on to the 4th of next March shall be that much smaller. Is not that competent?

Mr. SHERMAN. And then you pay another man $5,000.

Mr. MORTON. The other man gets $5,000, but you and he come out exactly even. There is the absolute principle of equality in it. The fact is, you have got your pay in advance, that is all, and that is not generally considered a disadvantage.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask my friend a question. I understood him to maintain that the amendment which had been voted down was constitutional; that it was not unconstitutional to have different rates of pay for different Senators. Now, passing by the question whether it would be constitutional for the republican majority here to vote that the democrats should have only half pay; admitting, as suggested, that we may have a first and second class of Senators here, as they do among the clerks of the Departments, I submit to my friend that there is an express provision in the Constitution against it. The Constitution provides, not that the Senators and Representatives shall respectively receive compensation, but that "the Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services." It is one thing, not different compensations for each member of Congress; so that, throwing aside the unreasonableness of it, according to my apprehension it is against the express letter and provision of the Constitution.

Mr. MORTON. I do not think that the clause of the Constitution that my friend from New Jersey reads requires any such construction; but the effect is not what he complains of at all. It produces no such effect. Suppose that my friend has only drawn his salary since the 4th of March last at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and there is a considerable balance in the Treasury now to his credit; suppose I have drawn mine at the rate of $7,500 per annum, and there is no balance; what is the effect of that amendment? The effect of it is that on the 4th of March next we shall come out precisely even; he will get $5,000 in future, and I shall get something less than $5,000 in future; but the principle of equality and of justice is preserved exactly. My pay is to be less from now until the 4th of March, 1875, than his, because I have drawn more in the past; his will be more than mine, because he has not drawn so much. Now I ask if we do not come out precisely even, and if it is not just the same compensation precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, right there I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the difference between the amendment which he voted for a moment ago—and I voted with him—and this, is, first, that this amendment expressly provides that no diminution of pay shall take place until next March, in place of leaving it to occur, as the other amendment did, at once; and, secondly, this amendment compels us to legislate over again afresh, not only that $7,500 for this year is to be the salary, and a proper salary, but that that is to be the proper salary, with all the old mileage added to it. That is the difference between the last amendment and this, as I conceive; and I agree with the Senator that the other amendment did not at all run against the Constitution, and I do not see why anybody should have that difficulty about it.

Mr. MORTON. I agree with the remarks of the Senator from New York; and in conclusion I will simply call the attention of my colleague, who I know wants to do just right about this thing, to the fact that the first amendment placed all members of Congress since the 4th of March on a precise equality; they would come out exactly even; one would get not a cent more than another. But this last amendment will have the effect of cutting down the compensation of new members to come in hereafter to $2,500 a year—men who have not received the increased compensation from the 4th of March. That is an absolute injustice. I know my colleague does not desire that, but that is the effect of this amendment; and for that reason I do not desire to vote for it.

Mr. PRATT. If my colleague will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I see the point he makes, and I think the point is well taken; and I propose to modify my amendment so as to insert the words "elected or chosen previous to December 1, 1873." That will remove the objection, I think.

Mr. THURMAN. That is the very amendment I was going to suggest to the Senator from Indiana who moved this amendment, because it removes the objection stated by his colleague, the Senator nearest to me, and makes his proviso apply only to Senators and Representatives who have been chosen or elected before the commencement of this present session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Since the 4th of March last.

Mr. THURMAN. No; since the 1st day of December last. There has been but one election held, that in California, and there is to be another in Kansas; that removes that objection.

There is a singular confusion somehow or another about this amendment. If I understood you, Mr. President, you voted against the amendment upon which the vote has been taken on the ground that it was unconstitutional; but you can vote for this on the ground that it is constitutional. If I understood the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday, that is his position. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] voted for the proposition upon which the vote has been taken, because he believed it to be constitutional; but he cannot vote for this, because he believes it to be unconstitutional.

Mr. CONKLING. No, no; because he believes it to be unjust.

Mr. THURMAN. And unconstitutional too, as making a discrimination between the salary of different Senators.

Mr. CONKLING. No.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, then, he cannot vote for it, because it is unjust. Let it be in that way. Now what is this amendment? As it is now modified, the only difference between it and the proposition upon which we have voted, is that this extends the present law, or continues the present law, in force until the 3d day of March next. If this proposition be adopted, the result will be that each member of the Forty-third Congress will receive $10,000, if he shall serve during the whole Congress, and mileage—just precisely what the bill, as reported by the committee, proposes shall be his compensation. That is the whole effect of it.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; or you may have the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, I do not wish it. I wish to ask a question. As I understand the amendment proposed last by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to make the first amendment apply only to those who are elected prior to the 1st of December, it would then result that from this time forth in this Congress and during this same session there would be two classes of Senators here as to compensation—those elected before the 1st of December drawing at one rate, and those elected after the 1st of December drawing at another rate. Am I right in that?

Mr. THURMAN. The result of it is this——

Mr. CARPENTER. I am not talking about results; I want to know the fact.

Mr. THURMAN. To be sure.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call on the Senator for facts. I am "some" on results myself. [Laughter.] The result would be, in my judgment, to violate the Constitution palpably, unless the Senator can maintain, with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON]—and I am glad to see such tremendous forces yoked together on a constitutional question—that the Senate can stand here and fix discriminating compensation among its own members.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask the Senator if this last suggestion does not present the question of inequality more strongly than it has been presented heretofore?

Mr. CARPENTER. If it does, that will be beneficial to some Senators here on this question, and especially to the Senator from Indiana, who maintains that it is entirely constitutional to do that.

Mr. MORTON. You do not answer my question.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not intend to. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. Now, Mr. President, let us see what the outcome of the thing is.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does the Senator desire to interrupt me?

Mr. THURMAN. No; I thought you interrupted me.

Mr. CARPENTER. No; everybody was interrupting me.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought I had given way to you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. I misunderstood it. I thought I was interrupted by two or three, especially by the Senator from Indiana. If I was mistaken about that I will give way.

Mr. THURMAN. I have only to say this: the outcome of it is that each member receives pay at the rate of $5,000 a year and mileage. Now, the supposed unconstitutionality of it in the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin rests upon the idea that any bill which does not pay, precisely at the same time and precisely for the same period of time, exactly the same compensation, without any reference whatever to any other consideration than the mere efflux of time, is necessarily unconstitutional. I do not agree to that. I agree that the compensation must be uniform. I believe that, and have believed it all the time. I do not believe that you can discriminate. As to the case put by the Senator from New Jersey—the idea that you can provide to pay the republicans here twice as much as you pay the democrats—that would violate the principle of justice and shock the common sense of everybody. [Laughter.] It would violate the principle of quantum meruit. It ought to be the other way. You ought to pay us two dollars to your one. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me at that point——

Mr. THURMAN. Let me finish.

Now, I do not agree that in order to make it constitutional you must necessarily pay at precisely the same day precisely the same sum to every member.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will not the Senator specify how great the difference may be?

Mr. THURMAN. Here is the case: For the reasons which now actuate us we propose that those who have received this enlarged compensation shall receive a less compensation for the time to come until the end of this Congress. That is not unconstitutional; because with respect to a new member you give him the same rate of compensation, to wit, $5,000 a year, and pay him from the time he takes his seat. I cannot see any unconstitutionality in that. We have had the advantage; we have received our pay in advance. Those who have received it have received payment in advance. They have had that advantage. That is very true; that is a thing you cannot undo; but because you cannot undo that advantage which they have thus received, it does not produce any constitutional inequality that you pay them a less sum per month, so long as you make the compensation precisely the same that you pay a new member who comes in for the first time and who has received none of this increased compensation. I can therefore vote for the amendment as it is now proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I am utterly at a loss to characterize in parliamentary language this effort on the part of Senators to accomplish that by indirection which they aver cannot be accomplished directly. If I were tenacious of the reputation of these gentlemen, I should be very sorry that they should go out of this Chamber successful with such cheap political wares and commodities on their hands in the effort to filch legally, constitutionally, and parliamentarily from the pockets of fellow-Senators. "Honor among thieves" is a proverb; but on the question of comity, legislating among equals in everything only in the amount of the wealth—for the last document that comes on my table this morning says:

> Men like SHERMAN, of Ohio, at the head of the Finance Committee of the Senate, now a millionaire, went to Congress poor—

if that is true, then we differ; and I differ from the honorable Senator in regard to that. I do not differ with him——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he says that statement is true?

Mr. TIPTON. I know nothing about that statement. I give it as I get it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it is grossly unsenatorial and grossly false; I say that it is grossly unsenatorial to read it here—it is a garbled statement; and it is grossly false in fact. Such a statement as that was never made in my presence. As a matter of course I could not answer a newspaper; but I say that the Senator who introduces that statement here, without knowing whether it is true or false, violates his duty as a Senator, and is deserving of the common execration of all his fellow-members.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I read that extract to illustrate the proposition I was making, that there was probably a difference between us in regard to pecuniary ability when the honorable Senator says that he can stand a salary at the low point now proposed, until the end of the present Congress, and he wishes us all to do so; and that happening to be the last document that came upon my desk, I thought it nothing at all discreditable to read this much of the document, which referred to a single fact which is not discreditable to the honorable gentleman: for how many other Senators have come here without large pecuniary ability and by this time of service have become rich. I insinuate nothing about means; and therefore the honorable Senator is too fast when he asserts that I wish to give to that any improper bearing or turn toward him or his character. I meant no such thing. But so far as the honorable Senator is concerned I am not astonished to hear him say, as I understood him—and he will correct me if I am wrong—that he thought the proposition was not right, but nevertheless that he would adopt it and vote for it. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. When you get through I will answer.

Mr. TIPTON. I am not astonished if that should be the correct exposition of the Senator's words, for I remember on a more memorable occasion in the Senate, when the question was, shall the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations be removed from the high and honorable position he had occupied so long before the Senate of the United States and the courts of the civilized world? that the honorable Senator from Ohio then took that identical position, if he has taken it to-day; and I was not astonished that he should take it, for then, in regard to the means used to depose and decapitate the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, he said in his place in the Senate that they were wrong; that they were unjustifiable; that they could not be in any sense vindicated; "but," said he, "I will do the act;" and he did it. And therefore I am not at all astonished that he should occupy such a position as that; and yet he does not give me to understand whether he occupied it this morning or not. If he did, I unite the two, because they are connected in my mind.

If the logical conclusion of the amendment carries the honorable Senator from Maine to make an invidious distinction here, and undertake to take from the pockets of Senators that which they have received by law since the 4th of last March, then I have an amendment that will meet his case and the case of the honorable Senator from Ohio, and it is this:

> And be it further provided, That there shall be taken from the pay of the Hon. Senators MORRILL, of Maine, and SHERMAN, of Ohio, the sum of $2,805.56, by them received as back pay under the act of July 28, 1866.

And then we shall have an approach to equality and Heaven's justice in the legislation of the Senate of the United States; and when I see that that goes through swimmingly, I will then make that motion in regard to sundry other gentlemen who can get the privilege of relieving their consciences and their pockets at the same time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will now repeat the question he put to me a moment ago, I will answer it, as I now have the right to do.

Mr. TIPTON. Whether, in regard to the operation of the pending proposition, the Senator said that it was not just and was not fair, but that under the circumstances he was willing to adopt it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I stated that the proposition made by the Senator from Indiana was not just and was not fair, but if the Senate of the United States was desirous to accomplish the object of paying the members of the present Congress $5,000 a year, I felt disposed to vote for it.

Mr. TIPTON. That is what I understood.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, let us look at the spectacle that is presented here this day. Here we are in a high deliberative body, supposed to be governed, not only by the rules of order, but by the rules of gentlemanly courtesy. Here is a debate in which I certainly have not participated so as to make allusions of any personal character whatever; I have not referred to myself or to my course in this whole matter, although it is known to Senators that I have opposed the salary bill from first to last and have not received the back pay. I have not alluded to any Senator. And yet here a member of this body, which ought to be marked by the highest degree of gentlemanly courtesy, introduces what? He calls it a document. What kind of a document? Where is it? I will ask the Senator what he read from?

Mr. TIPTON. "The financial system unmasked and dissected. Address of Horace H. Day, of New York, before the Illinois State Farmers' Association at its annual meeting, December 17, 1873, upon the subjects of banking and currency and their relations to the industrial classes."

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. President, here is a Senator who comes before us and reads a paper that I never saw, not laid upon our tables, not a document of Congress, but a speech made by somebody in Illinois, in which I am charged with being a millionaire—I wish I was; that I came to the Senate poor; and this Senator did this with the purpose of making the imputation that in some way or other I had become a millionaire by being in Congress or made money out of my office.

Mr. TIPTON. No, Mr. President; I utterly disclaim any such intention. The only force I intended it to have was, that if it was true that such was the financial change in the condition of the Senator, he should not have more—sympathy with others—but that he should not be so fast in a step forward here not justified, in the assumption of many around him, as constitutional, to embarrass other men equal in position with himself, but not equal in pecuniary ability. That was all.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator did not intend to make that imputation, why did he introduce it here? It was intended for that purpose.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, my disclaimer is worth as much as the disclaimer of the honorable Senator. I have made it to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, then, Mr. President; I accept the disclaimer; but I wish to say now, as I have had occasion to answer to a newspaper paragraph of this kind brought by my political adversaries, that so far as the allegation of fact is concerned it is not true in either branch of it. I can say before man and before God, and defy the world and every individual in the world to show that ever I received, directly or indirectly, while I have been a member of the Senate of the United States or a member of Congress, any single dollar except the pay allowed me by law; and I have been so fastidious that I have disconnected my private business from everything that could, by direction or indirection, spring from my public position. I hope that will be an answer to the Senator, unless he finds somebody to contradict this statement of mine, and then I will meet him or anybody else who makes the assertion.

Mr. TIPTON. I made the disclaimer in good faith; and unless the gentleman should have accepted that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will suspend until the Senator from Ohio yields him the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nebraska makes the disclaimer in good faith, and I accept it. But when an imputation is made in the Senate of the United States against a fellow-member by a Senator, it is quite a different thing from that common clamor and slander which sometimes floats over the surface of society. And when it is made here I meet it and defy it. But I now again say, the Senator having disclaimed it, I have nothing more to say about it. I wish now to make another observation on another point in his speech unless he desires to say something.

Mr. TIPTON. I am gratified that you have come to the conclusion that you can afford to accept it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to proceed further, but I will hear the Senator if he desires to say anything more about this matter. I dismiss it from my mind.

Mr. TIPTON. I have nothing more to say, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, then. Mr. President, in regard to the particular matter that brought this up, I said before that if Senators were determined to embarrass us by amendments, they could easily do so. I believe the committee who carefully examined this matter came to a wise solution of this whole question. They carefully examined all these points of difficulty, and decided them as I think was right. They declared that, for the future, the salary of members of Congress should be $5,000 a year; that the law, as it existed on the 3d of March last, should be the law of the land still. I believe now that the proposition made a while ago and voted upon is as clearly unconstitutional as it is possible for anything to be. I believe that if we should attempt to change the salary of the President, it would be clearly unconstitutional; and this proposition was no more so. But finding a large number of distinguished Senators in this body who seemed desirous that we should go back and fix the salary at $5,000 a year from the 3d of March last, I felt disposed to gratify them. I do not think it is right; but I do not wish to make issues of this kind that will embarrass either me or the party to which I belong. But if Senators are determined to force them upon me, I say again that I would rather suffer the injustice to myself and the inconvenience of a salary of $2,500 a year from the 4th of March next than to go home and talk to my people about a matter which concerns myself. We ought to feel a little delicate in regard to this question, which involves our own personal and private interests; and if Senators can live on $2,500 a year for the next year, I am perfectly willing to do so, or I am willing to stand by the report of the committee.

I regret, sir, the debate in the Senate upon this question, which ought not to excite the slightest feeling, which involves comparatively little when compared with any of the great interests that are brought before us day by day. It is likely to consume a great deal of time and lead to just the kind of discussion that occurred in the House of Representatives, and I fear with the same results.

Now, sir, having made these observations, I say again that if these amendments are to be pressed and issues are to be made to embarrass members of this body before their constituents or in public opinion, I am willing to surrender, not only one-half of my pay for the next year, but the whole of it, rather than to have these issues constantly presented and be told that I refused to surrender a part of what is called "the salary grab." I would surrender the whole of the pay rather than have these personal questions raised against me.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, when the bill came here from the House of Representatives on the subject of salaries I was willing to vote then without a word, and I am inclined to think that the bill as it came from the House is more equitable, nearer just, and fairer in all regards than the bill reported by our committee. It showed to the country upon its face precisely what the members of Congress were to receive. The old law did not do so. While it purported upon its face to give members $5,000 a year, there were other sums which were allowed us in the law fixing the salary and in other laws and resolutions of Congress which increased our pay very nearly to the sum fixed in the House bill. The better way, with candid and fair men, would have been to say so in so many words, and let the law so stand.

Sir, I cannot understand why it is that gentlemen seem so frightened at the clamor in the country on this subject. I can say, I think, that I never have taken, and I never intend to take, action in this body or in any other official position on account of public clamor. I intend to exercise my judgment, and take the consequences. If the people do not like it, they have their remedy.

When the committee made their report, I was willing, taking into consideration the feeling which seemed to exist in Congress and throughout the country, to vote for the substitute reported by the committee; but it seems that we are to have no peace on this subject; that propositions are offered, I will not say with the intent, but which have the tendency, to perplex the minds of the public, to embarrass the members of this body, to require of them much time in explanation before the people of the country, and which can result in no good whatever, as the proposer of this and the preceding amendment must have seen ere this time.

The proposition now offered is a remarkable, indeed a marvelous proposition; it is unique in its proportions; and if it shall be adopted, it will be regarded as an anomaly in the legislation of this country. Sir, it is nothing short of an indictment by this body against its own members. It is a charge upon those who have received their legal salary since the 4th of March last of wrong, of getting money out of the Treasury of the United States by unfair and unjust means. It is a charge of criminality upon those members which I do not propose to indulge in, and which I would not vote for for any consideration. If I believed that the members of this body were taking money out of the Treasury corruptly, as seems to be claimed by some persons in the country, I would resign, and go to my home and remain among an honest people. I do not believe that I am surrounded by thieves and robbers. I have a higher opinion of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives.

Here was a law of Congress, passed and approved by the President on the 3d of March last. It is admitted by every Senator who has opened his mouth upon the subject to have been constitutional. After the law passed and was approved by the President most of us, I apprehend, have from month to month drawn the sum thereby fixed. What wrong was there in taking that money? The salary was "ascertained," in the language of the Constitution, "by law;" the law was passed before the year commenced or the money was drawn. The money was ours in right, in justice, and in fairness. And, sir, this effort, by indirection, to get it back is an imputation upon those of us who have taken the salary accruing since the 4th of March last. I do not mean to say that it was offered for the purpose of casting such an imputation; but if the Senate shall adopt it they acknowledge themselves to have been guilty of wrong, to have violated their duty to their country and to themselves. I do not propose to yield my self-respect.

Now, sir, I have no doubt myself of the violation of the spirit of the Constitution by the adoption of such an amendment as this. The letter may not be infringed upon, but the Constitution does not speak in express terms in regard to many things which are embraced in that instrument; and are we here, while acknowledging that we cannot do this thing directly, to say that we will violate the spirit of the Constitution by doing that indirectly which we cannot do directly? The accomplishment of this purpose cannot be effected by proposing it in so many words; for if a suit should be instituted against a member of this body who has received this money, it is admitted that it could not be recovered by the Government in such suit; and that being so, you propose by force of law, operating on your officers, to require some members of this body to refund, because others, for reasons that no doubt are satisfactory to themselves, see fit to make a present of what they have received to the Government.

Mr. President, I think it is time to cease this child's play. For what purpose this thing is gotten up I do not know. It seems, however, that this question is to be presented in various forms, in order, it may be, thereby to embarrass some. To me, I wish to say, there is no embarrassment about this business. I intend to vote what I believe is right and leave the consequences to take care of themselves. Whatever law this Congress may pass upon this subject I expect to obey, but I intend to protest and to vote against injustice, and at least to preserve my self-respect.

Mr. PRATT. Before the Senator from West Virginia takes his seat I desire to ask him a single question. I do not wish to make an argument in the case. I wish to inquire of him whether, if my amendment be adopted, the effect is not to give the members of the Forty-third Congress the same compensation precisely that the members of the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses will receive, and the same compensation that the members of the Forty-first, and Fortieth, and Thirty-ninth Congresses received, namely, $5,000 a year and mileage at the rate of four dollars for every twenty miles? If that be the effect of my amendment, wherein is the injustice? Does not every Senator and every Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives receive for this entire Congress $10,000, or $5,000 a year, and mileage as established by the law in force previous to the 3d of March, 1873? I desire to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia whether that is not precisely the effect of my amendment, and if so where is the injustice?

Mr. BOREMAN. I have answered that. The Senator's statement of his proposition is too specious. It is the accomplishment of the purpose of withdrawing from those of us who have received the money by indirection when you cannot do it directly. Why, sir, what is this proposition? That we will cut down the pay of members to $2,500 during one year, while the bill itself to which this is an amendment fixes the salary thereafter, and indeed from its enactment were it not for this proviso, at the sum of $5,000 per annum. Sir, it is an evasion; and I am only astonished that the honorable Senator from Indiana should undertake to evade the spirit of the Constitution in this way. It is just as palpable as if it ran against the plain provisions of the Constitution; that is, so far as the spirit of it is concerned, and the injustice to members. He cannot accomplish it in so many words; he cannot accomplish it directly; but he wishes now to make an arrangement by which he will withdraw money from the pockets of those who did receive it; and the objection I make to it is not simply the money, but it is a brand upon those gentlemen who have received the money, that they have committed a wrong, and not simply a legal wrong but a moral wrong. I do not propose to stultify myself before the country in that way.

Mr. PRATT. If my friend will pardon me, I desire to say that I took the same oath that he did to observe the Constitution of the United States, and I desire now, as he thinks that this amendment of mine violates that Constitution in some way, that he will lay his finger upon that particular part of the Constitution which is supposed to be violated. I want to be convinced that this measure is going to have the effect to violate the constitutional rights of the members of this body or of the other House, and I shall be very ready to withdraw it if he will convince me of that fact.

Mr. BOREMAN. Well, Mr. President, according to my judgment, there is no difficulty in that matter at all. The spirit of the Constitution evidently contemplated that every member of this body should receive the same salary; and this amendment does not expressly provide, but it is subject to the objection which has been urged here in regard to those members who are to come in hereafter, and I do not regard the amendment which has been added to it fixing the date before which the election shall take place to remove that objection at all. The purpose of this amendment also, as I have repeatedly said, is to withdraw money already received under the law by the members; and it is no use to say that it complies with the letter of the Constitution; the purpose of it is as plain as if it were expressed. That is it; and the frankness and candor of my friend from Indiana ought to acknowledge the fact that it is to accomplish by indirection what we cannot do directly; that is to say, it temporarily reduces the pay of members and thereby draws from them what they have already received under a given salary fixed by law. It seems to me that it is too plain to admit of controversy, that it is intended to do that by indirection which cannot be done directly. While it perhaps comes within the letter of the Constitution, I say it is a violation of its spirit and of all fairness and justice, and it is an effort to ask us to stultify ourselves, to become our own judges, to pass sentence upon ourselves as guilty, and execute that sentence, which I do not propose to do.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I presume I have taken about as much of the time of the Senate on this subject as Senators care to have me do; but inasmuch as this amendment presents the question in a new phase, I desire to be heard respecting its constitutionality. The Senator from Indiana says he would like to have the unconstitutionality of this proposition pointed out. Old Polonius warns us against men who "by indirection find direction out." I think if Polonius was on this floor he would find the gentlemen who "by indirection find direction out." I understand some of the Senators, and good lawyers too, take the position that if the salary bill made a distinction in the amount of salary as between Senators or Representatives in Congress, it would be clearly a violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

The Constitution provides that—

> The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services to be ascertained by law and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

It does not mean that they shall receive several different compensations, but they shall receive a compensation for their services, meaning a like compensation. That evidently is the plain construction of the language of the Constitution. I will not say that good lawyers may not take a different view of this question, because gentlemen who are reputed to be good lawyers have taken a different view of it, and have said that you might pay one Senator one compensation and another Senator another compensation. I beg to differ with them upon this point, and I start my proposition on the basis that we must have equal compensation for our services. First, then, if we debit Senators with the amounts they have received, so as by that process to reduce their salary for the incoming year below that which Senators who now come in shall receive, it is an unlike compensation paid to them instead of a like compensation.

I will demonstrate that this amendment of my friend from Indiana does discriminate. The amendment provides that the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress, elected prior to the 1st day of December, 1873, shall receive $7,500 per annum up to the 4th day of March, 1874. That applies to Members and Senators elected prior to the 1st day of December last. All Senators and Members of Congress elected prior to the 1st day of December last are to receive $7,500 to the 4th of March, 1874, and then $2,500 thereafter, until the 4th day of March, 1875. Then the whole amendment applies in this particular to Senators and Representatives elected prior to the time stated. What is the salary of Senators elected subsequent to that time? If I understand the construction of this amendment (and if I do not the chairman sits here and will correct me,) Senators and Representatives in Congress elected subsequent to the 1st day of December, 1873, will receive $5,000 and mileage up to the 4th of March, 1875. Am I not correct? [Mr. WRIGHT nodded assent.] You fix the compensation of Senators from the passage of this bill forward and not back; and the very moment you admit that, you take into consideration that which they have received by law heretofore, which is vested in them as their property. No Congress or court in this country has the power to divest them of that right except by confiscation, or for public uses for which they must be remunerated by a just compensation. Then the salary bill commences from now; and if it commences and affixes a salary from the passage of this bill forward, that salary must be equal among the Representatives in Congress and the Senators of the United States. If it is not, it is clearly in violation of the Constitution, or of the spirit of it. Then, without reference to the salary back, you fix a salary for the future, and what is it? Seventy-five hundred dollars to the 4th of March for a portion of the members, and $5,000 to the 4th of March for another portion of the members. That is the effect of this amendment, and I defy contradiction. I ask the Senator from Indiana if I have not stated correctly the effect of this amendment?

Mr. PRATT. The Senator will pardon me; I was not paying attention.

Mr. LOGAN. I say that this amendment fixes the salary of Senators now, who were elected prior to the 1st day of December, at $7,500, until the 4th day of March, 1874. Does it not?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. But it fixes the salary of members elected subsequent to that time at $5,000. Then there is an inequality from the very day that the bill passes until the 4th day of March, 1874; one receives $7,500 and another $5,000. Now I appeal to the Senate if, according to the views of the Senate expressed, this is not clearly beyond our authority? When the other amendment was up, when the proposition was to withdraw that and substitute this, I opposed it, because I thought this more clearly and palpably in violation of the Constitution than the former proposition.

Now let us go a little further. You then fix the salaries of Senators and Members from the 4th day of March, 1874, who were elected prior to the 1st day of December, 1873, at $2,500. Then you must fix the salary for those elected subsequent to that time at the same amount, which would be $2,500 per annum. But you do not. You fix it at $5,000. Can you make this inequality? I say not.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest whether it does not also follow, from this amendment, that the Senators elected after the 1st of December, as contemplated by the amendment, will receive $5,000 after March next while the rest of us receive $2,500?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; that is what I just stated. It does provide that Senators who are fortunate enough to be elected after the 1st day of December shall receive at the rate of $5,000 a year for the next fourteen months coming, and we shall receive $2,500. That is the proposition. I do say that that proposition is so clearly and palpably in violation of the Constitution, in my judgment, that I would resign my seat before I would vote for it. I do not believe that my constituents require me to swear that I will support the Constitution, and when I believe a thing is in violation of it to violate that oath, and I shall not do it.

I am acting here under instructions from my constituents. I intend to vote for the repeal of this law, or so much of it as I have a right to do, because the Legislature of my State have declared against it. Hence, I consider myself instructed to vote to repeal it; but I am not instructed to violate my conscience by voting for any such amendment as this, nor will I do it. As I said before, I vote to repeal the law because I am acting as the agent of my people, not because I am going to confess that I did wrong when I voted for the law, for I do not believe that I did. It is a difference of opinion between them and myself. I obey their wishes, but it does not change my opinion. I act for them, and not for myself. When I followed the precedents from the beginning of the Government to the present time, I thought I was right. I still think so.

Now, sir, I am through, so far as the constitutional point is concerned. I have a word or two in reference to this kind and character of legislation. I believe the Chicago Tribune has been as strong in its condemnation of the vote of March last as any paper in this country. I have here an article published in that paper—from a correspondent—within the last few days, and which has been read by their subscribers all over the country, which defines this kind of legislation; and I will ask the Clerk to read it in such a voice as that Senators may understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CAPRICIOUS LEGISLATION.

To the Editor of the Chicago Tribune:

SIR: Capricious legislation is as much to be feared as that which is induced by corruption. Generally it is more wide-spread in its effects, and almost always has less reason to back it. In most cases corrupt legislation has some well-defined object, the attainment of which affects but comparatively few persons. Capricious legislation is almost invariably of an opposite character, as weak in definiteness of purpose as it is deficient in wisdom. The old saying, "Don't whip your child when you are in a passion," has a deal of wholesome philosophy in it. Its observance is conducive to sound parental government. Passion seldom does anything wisely, and its sequel is an everlasting undoing of what never ought to have been done. A madman may harm nobody if he keeps his passion to himself; but, if he acts under its impulses, he is sure to go wrong and injure others. Caprice is as unreasoning as passion, and as a legislative motor it surpasses all others in power for mischief.

Take the outcry raised against the late increase of salaries as an illustration of this subject. Let all that has been urged against that act be admitted, and still the leading demand made for its repeal was an example of pure capriciousness, full of mischief and danger. The people were mad; this they had a right to be. They demanded repeal; this they had a right to do. But they had no right to combine madness with repeal. Keep the two things separate, and they are well enough. Fuse them in legislative action, and they are wholly bad. A simple repeal, with a revivor of the former acts regulating the salaries, would place all of them that can be constitutionally affected just where they were at the date of approval of the act of increase—the change taking effect, of course, from and after the approval of the repealing act. But this was not the capricious demand which thundered about the ears of frightened Senators and Representatives. A retroactive repeal was the thing demanded. Since the 4th of March last salaries had been drawn as provided by law. The amounts so drawn were lawful in every sense of the term. When drawn, the money obtained thereby was as strictly the private property of the person in possession of it as any other of his funds, derived from whatsoever rightful source they might have been; and Congress would have the same right to legislate a man out of his title to real estate as it would have to require him to refund to the Treasury any part of his lawful salary. The Constitution says, "The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law." The compensation in this case was ascertained to be at the rate $7,500 per annum, payable in monthly installments. One-twelfth part became due each month, and, whether drawn or not at the time, became the rightful property of the member. If he should elect to present it to the Government, that is one thing; to take it from him by force of law is quite a different thing. The past is a sealed book so far as the salary is concerned; the future is open for action. Whatever change may at last be settled upon, it can rightfully take effect only from and after the passage of the law.

If wrong and capricious action in the present exciting case could spend its force upon the salary question it would be bad enough; but it can't stop there. The perpetration of wrong familiarizes us with wrong. What has been once done may be done again, and with far less hesitation. Unwarrantable action toward salaries may lead to like action relative to other interests. Legislative confiscations of portions of salaries may lead to hurtful encroachments upon other property. If the people may, by a capricious outcry, force Congress to do a wrong in the former case, another burst of popular passion may drive it to unlawful action in the latter. Now it may be salaries; hereafter it may be land.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. President, I have had that article read to show that men outside of newspapers have opinions on this subject. I presume that article was written by a gentleman of some legal attainments; I know not who, however; but he entertains the same views in reference to the right or power, and when I say "power" I do not mean the mere force, but the legal right or power to take from an individual that which has vested in him as property. I know it is wearisome to the Senate for me to talk at this time; yet I have a constituency behind me who amount to considerable in numbers and a great deal in thought and reflection. I desire to place myself as near right as I can before them by telling them honestly that I am voting their sentiments and not my own, but that I do it willingly, inasmuch as I understand it to be theirs. But I must say I am a little sorry to see the disposition manifested here on the part of some gentlemen. We sometimes become overzealous; we sometimes become so enthusiastic in a certain direction that our zeal carries us beyond that which in cooler moments would be our better judgment. I am sorry to see the zeal manifested on the part of some gentlemen here who did not, perhaps, very fortunately for them, vote for this salary bill when it passed, but voted against it; their disposition seems not only to repeal the law, for which repeal I am ready to vote, but to force Senators who voted for the bill into a false position before the country; to force them to stand upon the record as obstinately refusing to do right when they conscientiously believe they are going as far as they can go.

Now, Mr. President, I received my pay every month under the law of last March. I believed I was entitled to it. I think it was my property vested in me by law. I have used it. I do not propose to pay it back unless this Congress shall force me by an unauthorized law to act contrary to what I deem manly to do. There is a difference of opinion here in reference to the duty of Senators on this subject. Those who are so sensitive, and so conscientious, and so desirous of unloading themselves—I will not say for objects in the future; I will not say from a want of manhood—but they should not drive others to do an act which would show a want of manhood. There is an easy way for them to settle this question with themselves; let every man who believes that it his duty to do so go and give his money back. He can do that. The Treasurer will receive it now. No one will object to their doing it; but you should not force men who believe that they are entitled to it under the law to do what your consciences fail to force you to do, when no obstacle presents itself preventing you from doing it.

Mr. President, I am reminded of a little story by the disposition manifested on the part of some gentlemen here; and I respect all of these gentlemen, and I hope that some of them will be Presidents in future. I do not suppose that they have dreams of that kind, because such things hardly ever occur to men nowadays; but if they have, I hope their brightest prospects and fondest hopes may be fully realized in the future. But let me say that the vote on this amendment will neither make nor unmake great men, nor will it put them in higher positions than they are. It is not the kind of legislation, it is not the kind of great statesmanship that elevates men; small things for the purpose of driving others to degrade themselves is not the character of statesmanship that makes men great in this or any other country. They declare they ought to give their money back; but at the same time they want a law passed to force them to do what their consciences now tell them they ought to do. They want a law to help them do it.

Now my story, Mr. President. I heard of two boys once who were out hunting, that came across a wild boar. Both became very much alarmed and tried to get up a tree. One of them was fortunate enough to do so; the other was not. The wild boar ran between his legs and the boy seized him by the ears and held him. He looked up the tree and said, "John come down here." "What do you want?" said John. "Come and help me let this hog loose." [Laughter.]

That is about the condition of these gentlemen. They want a law passed to help them let the money out of their pockets. It will not hurt you to do it without a law; you can get rid of it easy enough. Congress will cover it into the Treasury for you. The people ask you to repeal this law, and that is all they ask you to do, all they require you to do, and all I propose to do.

Now let me say a word to the Senator from Indiana and other gentlemen who are so anxious to receive $2,500 per annum. If they pass such a law, and I am to receive $2,500 per annum, I shall receive it without complaint. I cannot live on it; but I suppose I will have to, like others, try it. Some men are better able to do it than I am, but I will stand it. If I do not I can quit; and, Mr. President, I do not want to quit. I know I can stand it as well as my healthy friend from Indiana; but I suggest to him a proposition that I think would be fairer than this. In the Methodist Church they have a rule by which they pay superannuated ministers according to the number they have in family. Do you not think it would be a good idea to regulate the compensation of Senators according to the number they have in family? [Laughter.] Inasmuch as you are trying to fix a salary of $5,000 for the incoming Senators, and $2,500 for the present Senators, upon what principle do you do it, unless it is upon the principle of large families or small ones, or is upon the principle that new members will be of greater service than the present Senators, and therefore entitled to a larger compensation? It must be upon some such principle; or perhaps my friend from Indiana has an idea of gradation in the Senate. We find nowadays that men are promoted to offices. Under the civil-service rules, I suppose we are to set up a sort of grade in the Senate; we will let some Senators get $7,500 a year, some $5,000, and some $2,500; the civil-service rules will promote those long in service if worthy, but this civil-service rule of my friend from Indiana will reduce us the longer we have been in the service.

I have another suggestion to make. Instead of trying to grade the Senators by law, suppose you offer an amendment to let our constituents, when they elect a member of Congress, mark on the ballot about how much they think his services are worth, and let him agree to take that; and also an amendment that whenever a Senator is elected by a Legislature, that Legislature shall estimate his worth and send it here to the Senate, and let the Clerk pay him according to the value they put upon his services. Then you will have an equalization, not in compensation, but according to the estimates of the different Legislatures that elect Senators. That would be just as reasonable as this amendment. It is of the same character. It is grading men down, or grading them up, on the idea that new men may be worth more than old men, or old men may be worth more than new.

Sir, I think I represent a constituency equal to any in this country in energy and in intelligence. I do not think they want me to vote that any man who comes in here shall get more pay than I do. They are willing for me to receive the same as other people; no more, no less. They think I am getting a little too much just now. Hence I am willing to knock off a part and take the old salary or its equivalent from this time forward. That is what they tell me I ought to do, and I am willing to act in obedience to what they say. That seems to be the judgment of the constituents of nearly every Senator here. But let our position before the country not be one of degradation.

Who has ever heard of a Legislature or convention asking us to take $2,500 as our salary? I have seen criminals go into court, and the officer of the court would say "Stand up." The criminal would stand up before the court, the jury, and the spectators, and to the indictment he would be asked to plead "Guilty or not guilty." The prisoner nearly always replied "Not guilty;" but I heard of an Irishman once who thought he would split the difference. He rose in his majesty before the court and responded to the indictment. Said the court to him, "Prisoner"—calling him by name—"are you guilty or not guilty?" He replied, "If the court plaze, in part guilty and in part not." [Laughter.] So my friends here, if we do not confess that we are guilty, want us to confess that we are guilty in part; that is, that we are $5,000 guilty, and therefore we will pay ourselves $2,500.

Sir, I am not guilty of any crime. I enter no such plea, nor can I be punished nor my property confiscated for anything that I have done. I have no objection to others confessing guilty if they desire. I shall not. I will not lose my manhood so much as to stand before the Senate and the country and tell them I confess that I have done a criminal act for which I am to have a penalty affixed.

I believed that I did right when I did what I did, and now I only take it back by voting for the repeal of the law at the demand of my constituents, and not on account of my convictions; and when I have done that I have done all that I propose to do, and all that you have a right to make me do. You have no right to force members of Congress and Senators to do that which the law does not require and which you cannot legally compel them to do. You should leave it to every man's conscience and to his own self-respect as to what he shall do with the salary he has drawn—keep it or return it, just as he pleases.

I say to you here now, before the country—and I want the world to know it—I drew my salary according to law, by virtue of a law passed by Congress and signed by the President. It was my property when I drew it. I took it, and I used it as my property, and I do not intend to pay it back willingly. If any one thinks he can acquire greater fame in this country by running and confessing that he has been guilty of stealing money, let him go ahead and confess it. I shall not do it. I got mine honestly. My conscience does not hurt me a particle. Whenever you offer me a bill to repeal the law with unconstitutional amendments or provisions, I will repudiate it by my vote, and I believe the intelligent constituency that stands behind me will have more respect for me and my manhood and sincerity than for the man who plays the demagogue. I beg pardon; I take that back; I will not use that word in the Senate Chamber. I am through, Mr. President.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I have not been very anxious to participate in this debate, and I am not now. I have a certain sort of conviction that Congress made very little reputation in passing the salary law in March last, and it seems to me we are not likely to make very much in the mode or manner of repealing it. It is clear, however, that our action, whatever it may be on this occasion, in relation to fixing salaries, is to last. No Congress at any very early day will again be likely to meddle with the subject. It ought, therefore, to be considered fairly and properly. Let us do what is just and right and pass upon it without delay. It is only that I am anxious to have early action on the subject that I rise to speak at all. I am anxious to get hold of some other subject of legislation, as I think there are some requiring immediate attention, and the whole business of the session will be delayed until this question is disposed of.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that the proposition reported by the committee is perhaps as just and fair as any that will be presented, and I am not for entangling it with these various amendments which, whether designed for the purpose or not, will have the effect of defeating it either in this body or the other. I am not disposed to believe that any of us here do not understand the system of tactics by which a measure of this kind is to be defeated, nor am I disposed to think that the people of this country do not understand the tactics by which a measure of this kind may be defeated. I impute no such purpose on the part of the honorable Senator from Indiana; but those who have been here very long understand the effect of loading a bill with amendments, and I know, if these various propositions that are brought in here, some of which may be just and some unjust, or inexpedient, shall be ingrafted upon the bill, it will insure its defeat, either here or in the other House, and a less satisfactory bill will ultimately be adopted.

I voted against the proposition first introduced by the Senator from Indiana because I believed it would have this effect. I shall vote against the one now under consideration because I believe it will have this effect. More than that, I shall vote against it because it establishes the salary for the present year at $7,500. I voted against that proposition last March. If it was wrong, or too much, then, that we should receive $7,500 for a year's service, it is wrong and too much now, and it is not to be sweetened by the other project, proposing to pay $2,500 for a year to come, which stands no chance of being finally adopted. The question is, shall we have $7,500 for this year? Having always voted against that, I shall vote against it now.

When the proposition for an increase of pay was before us at the last session, the great and the most potent argument that was then presented for its passage was that we were doing away with the very great abuse of the mileage system, by which one member received 50 per cent. more than another; and the only objection that I have to the report of the committee is that they have not presented any proposition by which that abuse, then so denounced, shall be done away with now. If the proposition of the committee had embraced something to relieve us from that abuse, then, in my judgment, the measure would have been as equitable and as just, perhaps, as the occasion demands. I shall, therefore, at the proper moment, offer an amendment remedying the defect pointed out, and with such an amendment I shall vote in favor of the passage of the bill as reported by the committee. I am opposed to all other amendments that are introduced for the purpose, or if not for the purpose, which will have the effect to prevent early and efficient action on the part of the entire Congress on this subject, and such action as will be satisfactory to the country.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I had fully resolved not to say a word on this subject except to vote, and I do not now design troubling the Senate more than two or three minutes.

It was my intention to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, now pending, until his last modification was made. I believe that without that modification it is perfectly equal and just; that with it it is not equal. As modified by the addition of the words "elected or chosen prior to the 1st day of December, 1873," those who take their seats on the 4th day of March next, or who have been elected since the 1st of December, will draw $5,000 a year; and those who have served during this present year will draw but $2,500. That is not equal, in my judgment. I cannot vote for the amendment with that modification. As it stood before, however, I could see nothing unjust or unequal about it. Nor do I regard it as a punitive measure, as suggested by several Senators. There is nothing of the character of punishment about it.

It is well known that it was the passage of the bill increasing the salaries and paying for back services that gave offense to the country. The verdict of the people has been distinctly expressed on that subject. I believe that verdict requires that that act should be entirely wiped from the statute-books, and all its effects. I believe that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, without his last modification, would have accomplished that object, and I would have been glad to vote for it. It would have done nothing more nor less than this: to have paid for the present Congress $10,000 and the mileage, precisely what we would have received if the bill of March 3, 1873, had never passed. It is true that those of us who serve during this year would have been a little in advance on the 4th of March next; but that would be to our advantage rather than to our disadvantage, I take it. So far from having anything in the character of punishment about it, it is simply a declaration on the part of Congress that that bill was an error of judgment, or, in other words, that it does not meet the judgment of the people of this country, and hence is repealed; and we draw precisely the salaries we would have drawn if it had never been enacted. I think the principle of equality is not violated where the same compensation is paid for the same service at the same time; and that would have been precisely the effect of this amendment before its recent modification. Those of us who serve from the 4th of March next, during the following year, would all receive precisely the same amount for the same number of days of service.

It is said that those who come in after that time would not be fairly treated. Why not? I believe in the opinion of almost every member of this body a man who is competent to serve here ought to be able to make $7,500 outside of these Halls. These gentlemen have been at perfect liberty to do that during the last year. They have not been here; they have rendered no service; and if they shall come in hereafter and receive the same sum that we do, nobody is injured. I am very sorry that the Senator from Indiana has made his recent modification, for I desired to vote for this amendment. I voted for the other because I believed it would have accomplished the same object. If he will withdraw the modification I shall be very glad to vote for this amendment; otherwise, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. A remark fell from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] which justifies me perhaps in making an observation; not that I take exception personally to the Senator's allusion; the felicity of it he must judge of for himself. The remark the Senator makes is that apparently, from some observations I have made, in order to be consistent, I ought to be willing that this bill should be amended so as to include the back pay of the Congress of 1866. Now, sir, I will say a word in relation to the proposition as it stands before us, and then I will allude to the logic which may be inferred from that remark as bearing on this general subject, as it seems to lie on the mind of the Senator.

The bill as it stands before us, reported from the committee, is a simple repeal of the salary act of last year. I take occasion to say now for the first time—for I have not cared to go into this subject particularly—that my own judgment is that that would meet, in a general way, what is termed the public demand upon the question of the salary bill of the last session, and therefore I did not propose myself to offer an amendment, and I should be entirely content to accept the proposition as it comes from that committee. In the few observations I made the other day, I steered entirely clear of any question such as has been raised by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, contenting myself with accepting an entire repeal of the law, and leaving all questions of the excess of salary which may have been received during the Forty-second Congress, or since. in this Congress, to the conscience or the judgment of the gentlemen receiving it, to dispose of as they pleased.

My own belief now is, that the repeal of the salary bill as provided by the report of the committee is the substantial thing to be done; and I come the more readily, perhaps, to that conclusion than some other gentlemen because, as I took occasion the other day to say, I did not believe that the increase from $5,000 to $7,500 without mileage, without perquisites, and without allowances of any description, and thus freeing the question of compensation from these objectionable features, and equaling the same with Senators, was an injustice to the American people, or was in excess of a reasonable compensation for services which Senators and Representatives ought to render their constituents.

The Senator from Indiana, however, has raised another question. That divides us upon a question which, perhaps, justifies the Senator from Nebraska, if he so thinks, in commenting upon a former act of mine, when I took pay under circumstances similar, I agree with him, to those which transpired on the 3d of March last, by which all of us were entitled to receive back pay, and many, I suppose—some, at least, according to the report which has been submitted by the Secretary of the Senate—having taken back pay, as did the members in 1866.

Now, Mr. President, upon the question raised by the amendment of the Senator from Indiana my ground is this, and to be consistent I do not see how I can act otherwise: As I said yesterday, I think the salary question, as raised by the last Congress, was an entirety; that it was a question of compensation relating as properly to the current pay of the Forty-second Congress as to the prospective pay of the Forty-third Congress, and, being so in law, I am sure there is no difference. In law, the back pay of the Forty-second Congress is as much the property of the Senator and the Representative as the prospective pay. No man gainsays that. The authority under the Constitution to pass the act is complete. The exercise of that authority by the Congress of the United States vested that money in every Senator and Representative who chose to take it. Nobody denies that. It is his, if he chooses to appropriate it, as much as that which has intervened since March 4 last. Now, when the Senator from Indiana raises that question as to whether we ought to cover into the Treasury the excess since the 4th of March last, the reply is, looking at the legal aspect of the case, as the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] argued a few moments ago, it is ours by law and cannot be reached by legislation, and therefore we are entitled to retain it.

That answers the law of the case unquestionably. But what are we doing here? We are repealing a law not obnoxious, it may be, to the sense of justice of many of us, but we are repealing a law that has offended the moral sense of the community—that has offended the public sense as an act of public injustice. Upon that ground, if we hold it to be so, then, I ask, how are we to purge ourselves except by going back with the excess, both current and prospective? And when the Senator from Indiana puts that question to me by this proposition I do not well see how to avoid the force of it. That is to say, if I carried back the excess of the Forty-second Congress on the ground that that was either illegal or immoral or unjust, it seems to me that I am bound by every sense of the fitness of things to carry this back also.

Now, I say to my friend from Nebraska, on the question of the back pay of 1866, I received it. I believe every member of Congress did. I agree with him that in logic, in law, and in morals, that is identical with the back pay of 1873, and I agree that the same moral obligation, so far as I can see, rests on me in either case. I speak only for myself, and not for others.

Well, sir, when this question arose at the close of the last Congress, what was to be done? We have seen the diversity of opinion on this very question; some Senators taking the money and appropriating it to their own use, other Senators taking it and carrying it back to the Treasury, others taking it and giving it to their constituents, others offering it to eleemosynary institutions—disclosing the diversity of opinion and sentiment existing on the subject. I say now, for the first time in a public manner, that I have neither taken nor refused the back pay; I have not appropriated it in the sense of using it, and my own determination in regard to that will be affected somewhat by the action of Congress. The circumstances under which that act passed and my connection with it—not holding myself responsible for it—did not permit me, with proper self-respect, at the dictation of anybody, at clamor from any quarter, to say what I would do when the subject should come up properly for consideration.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do not object at all to the honorable Senator from Nebraska calling my attention to the fact that I stand in relation to the law of 1866 precisely as I do in regard to the salary of 1873. I am myself able to make no distinction whatever, and with the "salary-grab"—if I may be pardoned for using that phrase—in my pocket, of 1866, I hesitate a little whether, under circumstances entirely similar in all respects both in law and in morals, I should make haste at the dictation of anybody to go back with the back pay of 1873, with the back pay of 1866 yet unatoned for. Other gentlemen may think differently. I arraign nobody. I question nobody's motives. I dare say that everybody has acted alike conscientiously on this subject. I refer to the fact now, because the honorable Senator from Nebraska has seen fit to bring it up, and also to justify, or at least explain, my vote on this occasion. I am perfectly willing, I repeat, to take a pure and simple repeal; and I believe that would meet the popular demand; and I believe in that way it would pass away from the Senate, and enable us to engage in the business pressing for consideration. I am willing to do that. As the matter stands I shall cordially vote for the proposition of the honorable Senator from Indiana, and make the return as ample and complete as was the increase, both current and prospective.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe I shall be drawn into making other or further remarks on the subject while it is before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, may I hear the amendment read that is proposed by the Senator from Indiana? I was not in when it was offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee the following:

Provided, however, That the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Forty-third Congress, elected or chosen prior to the 1st day of December, 1873, shall be at the rate of $7,500 for the year ending March 3, 1874, and shall be at the rate of $2,500 for the year ending March 3, 1875, exclusive of mileage, as fixed above.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, if I desired to make a speech on this question it would not be consistent with my ideas of propriety to do so. As a newly-elected Senator, I had no connection with the law which it is proposed to repeal—no opportunity to vote upon it, and no responsibility for its passage. It does not become me, therefore, to criticise those who made the law. It is not for me to condemn or approve. It is proper, however, that I should explain my vote and the object of an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time. I rise, therefore, with no purpose or desire to make a speech, but simply, as I said, to explain my vote and the nature of an amendment which I shall propose.

I cannot vote for the amendment which has just been read, offered by the Senator from Indiana, and for reasons which have already been so fully explained, and which I think ought to be so satisfactory, that I shall not take the time of the Senate in repeating them. But for the constitutional difficulty, my own opinion is that it were infinitely better to adopt the amendment suggested a few days ago by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART;] for if I know anything of public sentiment upon this salary business, the objection of the people does not lie against the salary as fixed for the future, but against the retroactive feature of the law—the back pay, as it is termed.

If, then, Senators are anxious that their action shall conform to the public demand, they cannot do so by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana; neither can they do so by the adoption of the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee, the honorable Senator from Iowa, for that amendment proposes simply to repeal the law, leaving untouched the most objectionable feature—indeed, I think I may say the only feature to which the people have ever objected.

I repeat, sir, that, so far as I have been able to read public sentiment, the people have not made objection to the salary as proposed for the future, and still less will they object when such a fact as was stated yesterday by my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is known, namely, that one who lives so unostentatiously as he has been compelled to supplement his salary by draft upon his private means to meet his expenses, and when the further fact is known that the pay as now fixed by the law is insignificant compared to the services which a faithful, honest, and earnest public servant may render to his country in this Chamber—that it is also insignificant as compared to the pay now fixed by law for other public servants, having not one tithe of either the expense or responsibility of a Senator.

But so far as I am individually concerned, Mr. President, I shall be governed in my votes on this question, and I trust upon all other questions, solely by considerations which shall seem to my own judgment just and proper. I do not boast of independence of public opinion. I trust in all my public acts on this floor to receive the approval of those who sent me here. But however that may be, I shall at least endeavor to act so as neither to forfeit my own self-respect nor fail of the approval of my own judgment and conscience. I cannot vote, as I stated, either for the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana or for that reported by the Senator from Iowa, because neither accomplishes the purpose for which Senators say they are intended, namely, to meet the demand of the public; and the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, not only fails in this particular, but revives an old law which discriminates in the pay given to Senators who do equal service upon this floor, and is therefore unjust. Sir, this is not what the people demand. which Senators seem so anxious to conform to. The people do not demand that a law shall be revived which gives to my friend from Oregon double the pay that is given to my friend from Maryland, by reason of the greater distance of his residence from the seat of Government. This is not what the people demand. Nor do the people demand a repeal of the present salary, unless by that repeal we shall give them the substance and not the mere shadow of retrenchment.

I cannot, therefore, vote for either of those amendments. But, sir, in view of the responsibilities which rest upon me because of my position here, and in view of the general tendency to extravagance by the General Government, I can vote most cheerfully for the House bill, provided an amendment to that bill shall be adopted which I shall offer, or some similar amendment. The House bill is just. It makes the pay of every legislator absolutely equal. It does not give to the Senator from Oregon double the pay it gives to the Senator from Maryland, but it makes the compensation equal. It not only does this, but it does it without an increase of the burdens of the Government. That bill fixes the annual pay of each Senator and Representative at $6,000; and it will be seen by reference to the report of the Secretary of the Senate that the average pay of the Senators who served in 1872 was $5,922.33, making the difference between the pay fixed by the bill as passed by the House and the pay actually received under the old law the sum of $77.67. Why not then, let me ask, adopt the House bill instead of the amendment offered by the committee? Why revive the discriminating features of the old law?

But, sir, as I said before, I cannot vote even for that bill unless some such amendment as I shall offer shall be adopted by this body.

The first section of the amendment I shall propose reduces the salaries of all Army officers which have been raised since the war. It reduces the pay of the General from $17,070, as now fixed by law, including only commutation for quarters and fuel, to $13,500, including the same allowances. It reduces the pay of the Lieutenant-General from $12,674 to $10,140, including all allowances. This was the amount paid to officers of that grade during the war, even when the Lieutenant-General was in command of the Army; at least it was the pay paid him prior to February, 1864; while the officer holding the second grade, which corresponds to the present grade of Lieutenant-General, was paid only $6,528, including allowances. My amendment further provides for the reduction of the pay of a major-general from $9,174 to $6,528. This was the amount paid to officers of that grade during the war; and the grade of major-general, let it be remembered, now corresponds with what was then the grade of brigadier-general, who was only paid $4,650; and it would seem but just that this latter amount, and not the amount I have proposed, should be the sum fixed for the future pay of an officer of the third grade, let him be called by whatever title he may.

The second section of the amendment provides for the reduction in the same proportion of the pay of all other commissioned officers whose compensation has been increased since the war.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Georgia. It seems to me that he must have some bill before him other than the one pending.

Mr. GORDON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will make what I say very pertinent to this question before I get through with it.

Mr. WRIGHT. He referred to section 2 of the House bill, as I understood him.

Mr. GORDON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has given notice of an amendment.

Mr. GORDON. The second section of which I am speaking refers to the amendment which I shall propose. I am simply describing that amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he was speaking of some other bill.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I find, upon examination, that the pay of the Quartermaster-General, of the Commissary-General, of the Chief Surgeon, of the Paymaster-General, and the pay of several others, has been increased to $6,890.50, being, as I compute it, an advance of from two to four thousand dollars over the pay of those same officers during the war.

The third section provides for the reduction of the salary of the Admiral of the Navy from $13,000, to which it was raised by the act of July 15, 1870, to $10,000, which was the compensation fixed by the act of July 25, 1866, and a similar reduction of the pay of all other officers of the Navy whose compensation has been similarly increased since the war.

The fourth section provides that the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000 per annum after the 3d day of March, 1877, and that the appropriations made for the expenses of the Presidential Mansion shall be, for each of the years 1873, 1874, 1875, and 1876, less than the average amounts so appropriated for each of the four preceding years by the sum of $25,000.

Sir, in 1860, and during the war up to February 29, 1864, so far as I am able to ascertain by a diligent search of the voluminous acts of Congress, the pay of General Winfield Scott, and of every other commander of the armies of the United States, was, including all allowances for rations and everything else, $10,140. By the act of February 29, 1864, the amount allowed for commutation of rations was doubled, an increase from $4,320 to $8,640 for rations alone, making the total pay by that act, $14,460. By the act of July 25, 1866, the grade of General was revived and applied to the commander of the Army, whose headquarters were to be at Washington, and his pay proper placed at $300 per month, with the same allowances hitherto given to the commander of the Army when known as Lieutenant-General, with the solitary exception of the item of fuel and quarters, which was increased from $75 to $300 per month. The total compensation, therefore, of the commander of the Army, according to my computation, under the act of 1866 and the act of July 15, 1870, cannot be less than $17,520, two-fifths more than was allowed to Scott or to any commander of the Army during the war. That of the Lieutenant-General cannot be less than $12,674; of a major-general, $9,174; of a brigadier-general, $6,890; of the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, Paymaster-General, and of several others, not less than $6,890.

Mr. President, in addition to this pay which is fixed by law, officers are entitled to other perquisites which are denied to Senators and Representatives, or for which they pay out of their private means, such as medical attendance, mileage when traveling under orders, fixed at ten cents per mile, and the purchase of rations and supplies at Government cost price. So that, taking all these perquisites into consideration and the addition which is given in rations for each succeeding five years of service, I estimate that the pay of the commander of the Army is not to-day under $20,000. I may be mistaken in that, but that is my estimate, and I am sure it is not far short of it.

Now, sir, why should the pay of the General exceed the salary of the Chief Justice of the United States? Where is the Senator who will stand in his place and state that the unavoidable expenses entailed upon Senators is not fourfold that which attaches to the position of Lieutenant-General or of a major-general? Where is the Senator who will stand in his place and say that the services which he renders to the country, if he is faithful to the trust reposed in him by his State, are not of greater importance to the country than that which is rendered by any officer of any grade of the Army in time of peace? Where is the common-sense citizen who will argue that the Lieutenant-General, or a major-general who reviews in peace his corps, or enforces the orders of his superiors, or hunts the wild Indian or the wild buffalo on the western prairies, is worthy of higher consideration or higher compensation than the man who, in this or the other end of the Capitol, is responsible for the laws under which we live, responsible for the protection of the public interests, and of the private rights and personal liberties of the citizen?

Sir, I would not be understood as in any degree disparaging the high vocation of the soldier. No act of mine upon this floor, no word of mine, here or elsewhere, shall ever be so ambiguous as to be construed into a reflection upon him who is always ready to obey the call of his country. No man is more ready to grant to him all the honors and all the emoluments which this country can afford to give. I am ready to vote to pay him well—to pay high, even in peace, for the man who holds himself always ready to give his blood and his life in obedience to the orders of his country or to the dictates of his conscience. I am ready when war comes to be the foremost in voting large pay and large honors. But I am not ready to concede the justice of giving double emoluments to the far inferior and less important portion of the public service. I am not willing, I am very far from being willing, by my vote, to so disparage the highest, the most important department, the legislative department of the Government, by what I esteem as a most inexcusable discrimination against it. I will not now, nor will I ever, consent to say by my vote that if a lieutenant-general, in the day of profound peace, is worth $13,000 per annum to the country, a Senator who honestly, earnestly, and faithfully labors for the public good, is entitled to less than half that compensation. I will not now nor will I ever consent to an effort to stifle the public clamor for retrenchment by degrading the position where brain and nerve and honesty are most needed, and stamping it as inferior to the position of the military. Such a course would be consistent in a monarchy or a despotism, but it is most reprehensible in this Republic, where the legislative acts of the representatives of the people make permanent or destroy our free institutions.

But, sir, while I take that position, and while I do not believe the present salary an undue compensation to a Senator, I also take this, and I wish to be distinctly understood: I will vote for $6,000 salary to a Senator, I will vote for $5,000 salary to a Senator, I will vote for $4,000 salary to a Senator, or for any reasonable salary to a Senator, provided that with such reduction we also reduce every other salary of every other public servant to an amount commensurate with the services he renders the country. I will vote for the House bill, if this amendment or any similar amendment shall be added to it. I will not vote for the House bill or for any other bill reducing the salary of a Senator, unless by that reduction we can both meet the wishes of the people and secure absolute economy.

I do not stand here in my place for the purpose of attempting to deceive the people, nor do I charge that any other Senator desires to deceive the people; but I do charge that when we refuse to touch the exorbitant salaries I have referred to, and shall attempt to silence the just demands of the people for retrenchment by the passage of any such meaningless bills and amendments as those now before this body, we shall fail to accomplish the purpose and betray the high trust reposed in us. For my part I am resolved that we shall have such real retrenchment, or the people shall know where the responsibility lies for its refusal. If we really mean retrenchment, if Senators desire the economy which they have so eloquently apostrophized, let me say to them that their logic and their rhetoric can be much better expended in urging the passage of a law which will retrench by the million instead of by the hundred.

I do not like to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. I do not like that political ethics which pays to the public tithes of mint and cumin and yet withholds from them the weightier measures of true economy. If we mean to economize, if we mean to have retrenchment, let us not mislead the people by the shadow when they have not the substance.

For myself, I repeat, I am ready for the personal sacrifice of any amount of economy, provided you can secure it to the people, relieve them from their burdens, lessen the taxes, and at the same time place the public servants in the various departments upon the same footing. I shall offer, at the proper time, this amendment. If it pleases the Senate to accept it, or to accept any other amendment of a like character, I am ready to vote for any reduction; if not, I shall record my vote against a policy which I consider a policy of deception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I have tried to hold my peace upon this subject, as I have upon many others, and I have but a few words to say now——

Mr. RAMSEY. I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut, and ask him whether he will not give way to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will not occupy more than three or five minutes. I am willing to give way if the Senate desires. ["Go on;" "Go on."]

Mr. President, I do not believe that taking the extra salary voted at the last session was either unlawful or immoral. I voted at every step against every proposition which tended toward the increase of the salary of members. I think the question of receiving the back pay was simply one of propriety. To my mind it was not proper for me, after having occupied a seat here until within a few hours of the close of the session of Congress, to receive a larger amount of money than had been voted by previous Congresses, and therefore I determined, and I expressed my determination at the close of the vote, to let that extra pay, whatever it might be, remain in the Treasury. I believe that every man who received it, contrary to my impressions of my own duty, was as honest, as true, as patriotic as I was, and I am not disposed to condemn any man.

But the question is, what shall we do now? I should be very glad to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana if I thought I could do so with propriety and accomplish the great object which he is aiming at; but it does not appear to me to be right for me to stand here and condemn my associates by asking them to return into the Treasury the money which they have received during the last ten months, and I believe we can better accomplish that which we are aiming at by rejecting his amendment, as we have the previous amendment which he offered, and coming directly to the vote on the report of the committee. I think that is all that we can accomplish. I think that will be as satisfactory to the public, perhaps, as anything we can do; and while I know that $5,000 a year, or twice or thrice that, is not a full compensation for the sacrifices which many men make by coming here, yet I think, on the whole, that it is as near an equitable adjustment, an equitable compensation, as we can determine. Therefore I shall vote, as opportunity shall offer, to restore the old law and have it take effect as soon as we can pass such a bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I am sure the Senate will bear me witness that, notwithstanding I have had charge of this bill, and from the beginning of the session have been the friend of the principal question that is involved in the bill, I have kept my silence, and said but little, if anything, upon it. I have pursued this course largely from a conviction that there could be nothing truer than was said by the Senator from Maine, that the sooner we act upon this bill the better for the reputation of the Senate. I have been more solicitous at all times to have votes and dispose of this question than to take up time by debate. Now I trust the Senate will come to a vote upon the pending question, and that all amendments which may be offered afterward will be voted upon at once.

I took occasion to say on the day before yesterday that if left to myself upon the question, as an independent proposition, presented by the Senator from Indiana, I should have voted for his amendment. I have no constitutional difficulties in my way on the question as it was then stated. The amendment, as now stated, I think is clearly unconstitutional. But I vote against both of them—and in this I am embarrassed, as you will see, because I believe in the principle of the amendments—but I vote against both of them, because I believe and know that the effect of their adoption would be to defeat the bill, and I regret exceedingly that my friend from Indiana, after he had had a square vote on the proposition this morning, should have felt it necessary to submit it in a different form, when he knows beyond all question what is the sense and judgment of the Senate upon it.

I do not say that my friend is unfriendly to the bill reported by the committee; I do not say he is unfriendly to the repeal of the salary law; but I do say that the effect of his amendment is to postpone the passage of the bill, and if he shall succeed in ingrafting it upon the bill, the defeat of the bill is inevitable.

I regret also, Mr. President, that my friend from Ohio, a member of the committee, should have found it necessary to give his approval to this amendment. I can well understand the reasons that may have influenced him; I can well appreciate them; but I regret exceedingly that, being a member of the committee, he should h ve found it necessary to give his approval to the amendment.

Now, I appeal to the friends of this measure that we shall stay here to-day until we pass this bill or dispose of it. I do not know what may be the final action of the Senate; but I do know that it is infinitely better for us and for the country that we pass upon this bill and defeat it rather than to consume day after day and day after day here by debate. I can conceive of no good result from that. I am sure that every Senator has his mind made up as to what he intends to do. I believe the sense of the Senate is in favor of a square repeal, and in favor of the bill as reported by the committee. I desire to say that that bill does not in all respects meet my approval. I prefer the bill I introduced here on the first day of the session, which provides for a square repeal, leaving the law to stand for $5,000 hereafter.

I have said, Mr. President, that I have no trouble upon the constitutional question. It is amazing to me that there is not the least constitutional scruple when you propose to increase salaries from this time on, whether there be a Senator who will probably come in hereafter or not; but when you propose to decrease from this time on, then the constitutional difficulty arises at once. I imagine that the true rule is this: that when you pass a law providing that the salary hereafter shall be so much, every man who comes into the Senate hereafter, if he be elected since I was or you were, comes in taking the same salary that I do and you do for the subsequent time. If he was not here when you and I were, if we had a larger salary, it was our good luck and his misfortune. If he comes in now he takes just as we; no more, no less. I say, then, I have no trouble so far as the constitutional question is concerned; but there is a clear difficulty so far as the amendment of the Senator from Indiana is concerned, in that it makes a different salary from this time to the 4th of March to those who serve for the last year of the Forty-third Congress.

I do not desire to take up time on this bill. I certainly have evidenced by my action that I do not. I appeal to the Senate now to come to a vote. If it is the sense of the Senate that we shall adjourn and postpone this question until to-morrow and until the next day, then I do not know but that I shall be inclined to abandon all effort to press the bill to a vote and leave the Senate to take its own course, to determine the question in its own good time. I feel, however, that it is a matter of much importance that we should vote on this question and get it out of the way. Here are other and grave questions demanding the attention of the Senate. The financial question, the Louisiana question, the bankrupt-law question—all these matters are pressing upon our attention, and the country is demanding that we should act upon them. Now, upon a little matter involving salaries, hour after hour must be expended, detailing the biography of members upon this question; biographical and autobiographical discussions are the constant theme before the Senate. If I may be pardoned, I may say that I regret that such things have been brought into this debate. I know that every member acts and has acted on this question according to what his conscience has dictated. If he has taken what has been called back pay, he has taken it honestly and conscientiously; if others have refused it, they have refused it honestly and conscientiously.

Now, I trust that my friend from Indiana, having had a vote on the main proposition, will find it consistent with what he believes to be the best interests of the country and of this measure to withdraw his amendment, or, at all events, that the friends of the measure will not stand here and vote for amendments, whatever may be their convictions as to the right of the thing, when they know the inevitable result will be to defeat the bill. If this amendment is carried, it will be carried by those who are in favor of it in fact, and by those who are opposed to it and yet are willing to incorporate it in the bill for the purpose of defeating the bill before the Senate. I tell Senators that that will be the effect of it. I believe so; and so believing, though I was ever so conscientiously in favor of it, and though I believed it was constitutional, I should vote against it, because I want practical results here, and practical results are what I know the people want, as well.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I am one of those who think that the discussion of the salary bill is not unprofitable. Whatever can be done to make members of Congress pecuniarily independent while exercising congressional functions, the people will in the end sanction. When the people of this country pursue a course that will send none but rich men here, they will regret it. Rich men have given us our financial system.

I have heretofore expressed my views on that question, and will not now trespass on the attention of the Senate to restate those views. Those views are to-day stronger than over. Owing to our financial system and its operation the salary now provided by law at $7,500 will not purchase more than $2,500 in England, or one-third as much. The simple reason is that money to do business in this country, and to produce articles which enter into the cost of living, is required to turn the whole value of an article of production, while in England money sufficient only to turn the balance between two articles exchanged is required. As the people in this country are situated, they require I should pay twenty dollars to do the same business that one dollar will do in England. This fact calls for treble the rates of interest we pay in our business, absorbed either in the percentage we pay directly, or in the cost of the article produced. Herein rests the reason for the increasing cost of living.

Again, I think that the sum total of our civilization is exhibited in the building of cities and towns. I do not say that the highest progress of the citizen is best attained thereby; rather the contrary of it; but such is the fact. Every house built in a city increases in a measure the price of every foot of land in the city; the rents, food, and service. A Cabinet officer cannot get a respectable house here for less than three or four thouand dollars a year rent. Every article of consumption very nearly approximates to the cost for rent. If the people were really aware of the exact status of this question, they would not exact restitution or diminution of salary.

I believe the machinery of our Government is very rickety; but it is all we have, and so long as it exsits I will do all I can to preserve it. It is rickety because of a rickety finance, and is the cause of the increase of salary to members of Congress. Its rickety condition calls upon legislators and the Executive for more careful attention than if it was sound.

I do not know of any employment in this world that is so wearing upon the strength of a man as the present employment of a conscientious member of Congress, for I can see the evidences of it, if each member cannot see it for himself.

I voted, because of a disposition to economize, against the increase of the salary, but careful consideration has convinced me of my error, and, for the reasons embodied in these remarks, I shall vote against all reduction. I think the reduction of the present pay of a member of Congress, with a view to economize, is in the wrong direction.

The back-pay portion of the salary act was perfectly right if you conclude that the old salary was inadequate for the service, as, without that, the votes of the outgoing members would not have been had, and the pay would not, therefore, have been increased for the future. If the increase of salary was proper, the back-pay clause was proper, also. The two cannot be separated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I offer an amendment, to strike out the first and second sections of the amendment reported by the committee, and insert what I send to the Chair. This amendment provides for the restoration of the old law as near as it can be, and I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be substituted, as follows:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the salaries of the President, Vice-President, Members of Congress, and Delegates, and all other officers therein named, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries and compensation of all said officers and clerks, of every name and description, shall be and remain as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of the act the provisions of which are hereby repealed: Provided, That this repeal, so far as it relates to the salary of the President, shall not take effect until the 4th day of March, 1877, on and after which date said repeal as to the salary of said officer shall have full force and effect, and as to all other officers from and after the taking effect of this act: And provided further, That this repeal shall not relate to or affect the salaries of the chief and other justices of the Supreme Court of the United States as now established by law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I propose to amend one of the sections reported by the committee, and I suppose that my amendment will be in order before the motion to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I then offer the following amendment, to come in after line 10 of the first section of the amendment of the committee, as a proviso:

Provided, That the allowance for mileage hereafter to be paid to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate for going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session shall be one-half of the sum allowed and paid prior to the act of March 3, 1873.

I desire to say that one of the strongest arguments that was made use of in order to carry the increase of salaries, and to defend it after it had been carried, was that it rectified the great abuse of the mileage system, by which we paid for travel four, five, or six times as much as the cost thereof. It would suit me, perhaps, better than any mileage at all, to have a fixed sum; but as it is not perhaps practicable to introduce a measure in relation to that matter here, or is not as practicable as it would be to reduce it, I propose to fix the same amount that we allow our military officers, that is ten cents per mile; reducing it from what it is now—twenty cents a mile—to ten cents a mile, which is the same we allow our military officers to have for traveling expenses. That will be in most cases twice the amount of the cost, and it is amply sufficient.

If there had been a provision inserted by which the whole mileage had been done away with and a fixed sum given, I would prefer it to the bill that was passed last year. This rendering an account of the expenses of members of the House and of the Senate is utterly repugnant to me, and I suppose it is to almost every other Senator. Therefore, while I would prefer to have a fixed sum, sufficient to cover in all cases the amount of traveling expenses, yet I deem it nothing but reasonable that the mileage abuse shall be rectified in rectifying anything else on this subject.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think it must be evident to Senators that we are not going to dispose of this bill to-night, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. O, no; let us finish the bill.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, the Chair will lay before the Senate some papers which are on his table.

Mr. RAMSEY. I make no objection to that being done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, communicating a report of the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to authorize inquiries into the causes of steam-boiler explosions;" which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating information called for by resolution of the Senate of December 2, 1873, as to the amount expended in aid of the construction of public works in the several States and Territories; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating information in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 5th of January, 1874, in relation to the number of officers in his Department furnished with official postage stamps; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. ALLISON to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Pensions, caused by the Senate excusing Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, from service on that committee.

AFFAIRS IN LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of R. H. Marr and other citizens of Louisiana, praying for the application and enforcement, in that State, of the guarantee contained in section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a telegram, addressed to the present occupant of the chair, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which the Secretary will report to the Senate, and then the Senate will be called upon to dispose of it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, January 5, 1874.

Hon. M. H. CARPENTER, President of the Senate of the United States; and Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives:

The legal Legislature of this State assembled to-day in obedience to our organic law. We beg of you to lay before your respective bodies the circumstances under which we meet. The orders of the general commanding this department, his statement of which we transmit herewith, who is acting under instructions from the Federal Executive, are of such a character as to prevent a large portion of our body taking part in this assemblage.

Were these orders withdrawn and our people assured that no interference would be made, we should be at once placed in a condition to discharge the duties resting upon us.

We earnestly beg that Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, will afford us such relief as the nature of the case may require. We are the victims of a dreadful oppression. The powers of government have been taken from the representatives elected by the people, and given to a body of men who cannot even pretend to have been elected.

We make this appeal, not only in the interest of our own people, but in the interest of the people of all the States, in the interest of public liberty. Our liberties have been destroyed by the action of a Federal court supported by the Army of the United States. Will not the guarantee article in the Constitution enable you to protect us? Judge Story has predicted that the erection of a despotism in one of the States will bring on the destruction of the whole Republic.

On behalf——

Mr. MORTON. I should like to inquire by whom that paper is signed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is signed at the end, and the Clerk is almost at the end of the paper.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

On behalf of forty-four representatives and twenty senators of the Louisiana General Assembly.

Signed by

EDWARD BOOTH,
ROBERT WORRELL,
Of the Senate.
JAMES L. LOBDELL,
M. J. FOSTER,
F. C. ZACHARY,
Of the House of Commons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition will the Senate make of this communication?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON. I see no purpose in referring that paper to the committee. That is a mere imposition—and it is not the first time that some men in New Orleans have done that—sending telegrams here and having them read. It ought to be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will simply say, in explanation of laying this paper before the Senate, that the Chair regarded it as a petition, which it was the duty of the Chair when he received it to lay before the Senate, and which it is the duty of the Senate, in some form, to dispose of.

Mr. MORTON. This trick has been practiced a number of times from down there.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It should be considered like any other petition, and it ought to be referred, certainly, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves that this communication be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. And printed.

Mr. CONKLING. A Senator near me suggests that the shortest way to dispose of this is to adopt the motion made by the Senator from Maryland. Notwithstanding that, I cannot sit here as one member of this body and assent to a motion to refer this telegraphic dispatch to a committee and print it. What are we going to print? The Constitution allows everybody to address this body in the way of a petition; but can it be that we are to sit here and receive telegraphic communications sent from anybody at any time, and treat them as if they were parliamentary documents upon which proceedings are to be founded, print them as part of the documents of the Senate, and refer them to the committees of the Senate? I can see, as the acting President of the Senate has said, that becoming the recipient of a communication addressed to him personally, as President of the Senate, it became his duty to lay it before the Senate; and he having done so, I submit that if the Senate allows it to lie upon the table, it takes of it all the notice which ought to be taken of such a communication, no matter now what may be the particular subject to which it relates. Therefore I hope the Senator from Maryland will assent to the motion which I make, that this communication, having been read, lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the communication be laid upon the table.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This motion is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear the Senator from New York make that motion. I thought he asked the Senator from Maryland to withdraw his motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I did make the motion, and I did it by saying that I hoped my friend from Maryland would assent to the motion that I did make, to wit, that this communication lie on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope the gentleman from New York——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to lay the communication on the table.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I hope——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lie on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask whether the motion made by the Senator from New York takes precedence over the motion made by the Senator from Maryland?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it does.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not a motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no subject here but this communication, which the Senator from New York moves to lay upon the table.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Dorsey, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Thurman, Tipton, and Wright—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Conover, Edmunds, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Robertson, Stockton, and Sumner—10.

So the communication was ordered to lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. RAMSEY. What has become of my motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Minnesota is pending, which is that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is that a debatable question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then we had better vote it down. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. It is no harm to say that I hope we shall go into executive session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, and Tipton—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Robertson, Stockton, and Sumner—8.

So the motion was not agreed to.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let this amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, being to insert at the end of the first section of the amendment reported by the committee the following proviso:

Provided, That the allowance of mileage hereafter to be paid to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate for going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, shall be one-half of the sum allowed and paid prior to the act of March 3, A. D. 1873.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Vermont why he desires in his proposed reform to adhere in his amendment to the inequality and alleged injustice of the former system of mileage. If he seeks to reach an exact standard of justice, why not pay every member of Congress exactly what it costs him to travel to and from the capital? The Senator remarked that the bill to increase pay at the last session derived its greatest strength from the injustice and inequality of the mileage system which that compensation bill dispensed with. It does not occur to me that his amendment removes that injustice. It is true that those who receive mileage will, by the amendment, only get one-half as much as they did under the old law, but still the mileage will be unequal, and the injustice of the measure would seem to me to run just in the same ratio that it did before, though the amount of mileage would be lessened. For instance, a Senator from the Pacific coast, who can come here for $300, would, under the Senator's pending amendment, get $800; while a Senator living in the vicinity of Washington would only get one-half of the mileage he would be entitled to, which, perhaps, might not, under the reduction, pay him what he had absolutely expended. Now, if the object of the Senator be to reduce it to a proper standard, why not fix the amount at the precise sum which it costs every member by the most direct route of travel to reach Washington? Why go back to the principle of inequality in mileage which must always discriminate so unequally between members of Congress, and which it was one object of the present law to get rid of?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have already admitted that this amendment does not remedy the abuse wholly, but it does remedy it to the extent of one-half, and it leaves that amount in the Treasury. It gives us precisely the same mileage that we allow the officers of the Army and Navy when they are compelled under military or naval orders to travel over the country; and that sum is deemed to be a just one. If we are to have any mileage at all, it strikes me that ten cents a mile is amply sufficient. We all know that it is much more than the actual cost of travel.

Then, when you come back to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, as I said before, the idea of giving an account of our traveling expenses is to me offensive and rather repugnant. Shall I, when I make out my bill of expenses, if I happen to smoke cigars—as I do not—give an account of how many cigars I have smoked? When I travel, shall I come on night and day, or shall I be allowed for the expense of a day at a hotel in New York, or at Springfield? I do not know precisely what is legitimate. If I come with my family, part of the expenses, perhaps, may be mingled up with those of my family. I hardly know how to separate them. Suppose I stop a day in New York, and require a parlor for my family; am I to charge that to the Government? Therefore I would much prefer to have a fixed sum for us all. If, perhaps, the total salary had been fixed at $5,500, it might have been acceptable; but in the absence of any such provision I do propose to remedy the gross abuse that exists in the mileage system; and I therefore propose that we shall be paid, what we allow our military officers, ten cents a mile—that is to say, to reduce the former mileage allowances from twenty cents a mile to ten cents a mile.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to make a suggestion on this subject. I do not want to discuss it at all. The Senator misapprehends the matter in one particular, I think. Members of Congress get mileage but once—going and returning. If they go a dozen times back and forth at half a dozen extra sessions, it makes no difference. The military mileage applies to every mile a man travels at any time when he travels under orders. That is the distinction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose, Mr. President, these traveling committees, that travel under orders, will get their mileage for it; but I do not know of any necessity for members of Congress to travel half a dozen times to and fro in the course of a session.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator misunderstands me. I say if they should happen to do that, if they should have to come to extra sessions of Congress, they would get no mileage except for one regular session a year. That is what I mean to suggest.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is of so rare occurrence that it need not be provided for.

Mr. LOGAN. The time has been when it was not rare.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Besides, when the pay was raised from $3,000 to $5,000 it was distinctly understood that there should be but one mileage, whether we had an extra session or not.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from Vermont seeks a curious mode of reaching a remedy for an admitted wrong. He proposes an amendment which, while reducing the amount of mileage actually received, yet perpetuates and legalizes a system which that Senator denounces as unequal, and which discriminates unjustly in the compensation received by members of Congress. If the Senator from Vermont desires to reach the enormity of the former mileage system, he can easily do it by limiting the amount that each member of Congress shall receive in lieu of mileage to the exact sum which it actually costs him to travel to and from the capital. Such an amendment reaches the evil complained of; such an amendment makes the compensation and cost of travel equal. The honorable Senator says he would not know how to make out his traveling expenses; he would be at a loss to know whether to charge for cigars which he might smoke, or for a parlor in a hotel if he had one. Such luxuries would depend upon the taste of each member, and address itself to his conscience whether it was within the legitimate rule of traveling expenses. But all this is dispensed with by the House bill. That bill includes all incidental expenses cited by the Senator by an increase of salary, which is made equal to and does not exceed in amount that provided by the Senate bill, but limits the amount for travel to the sum expended.

The Senator from Vermont admits that under the old system of mileage much more is allowed than is necessary—that it renders the compensation unequal to different members, and yet his amendment, although reducing the amount, retains the odious discrimination which he so warmly disapproves. Some members neither indulge in cigars nor parlors. How with them? I respectfully suggest to the honorable Senator from Vermont that he can reach the question precisely by passing the House bill. That increases the salary to the amount of incidentals which under the House bill would be received and abolishes mileage.

Some gentlemen, in addition to a parlor and cigars, might like to stop at Niagara for two weeks on the way to Washington; but their ability to do so would depend greatly upon how much they were receiving by way of compensation. Let us adopt the rule which shall pay a fixed sum of five or six thousand to each member, and pay him his actual cost of travel.

What I object to in the amendment is the avowal of the Senator that he admits that mileage is wrong, but that he is willing to retain it in a less degree with all its inequality. What I suggest to the Senator is, that he can remedy and extirpate the wrong entirely. Put the salary at what he believes it should be for every Senator, including stationery, and then just pay him his actual expenses coming here, that is his actual traveling expenses of eating and traveling; then distance will not increase the compensation, and every member will receive the same compensation and be reimbursed whatever sum his expenses of travel amount to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Obviously the Senator from Kentucky is disposed to criticise this amendment. If he was disposed to amend it, by offering the proposition which he suggests, of course he has ample power to do so. It does not strike me as being an objection to this measure that it does not go far enough, and therefore should be voted down because it still leaves a great abuse. Evidently it corrects a very large abuse and restores a large amount of money to the Treasury, and it does take as the standard that which we have fixed in reference to the military service of this country. I regard it as very nearly just and proper. I suppose that the traveling expenses of Senators who represent the Pacific coast may be something like seven or eight cents a mile. The charge for fare over the Pacific Railroad is greater than upon other roads in the country. Even this amount might be too much for those who travel mainly upon the lines of New York, where they are prohibited from charging more than two cents or two and a half cents a mile—I do not remember now which. It would be too large if all railroad charges were fixed at the same rate as the New York railroads, but at the same time it is a large stride in favor of reform, and I trust the Senate will vote for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to debate this question, but to make a correction in the proceedings of the 7th of January, in which Senator CARPENTER, in the course of his remarks, is represented as saying:

> I will vote with him—
>
> That is, the Senator from Indiana—> to carry the effect of this repeal back to the 4th of March last. I would vote to carry it back to the 4th of March, 1871, but for the impediment of the Constitution.
> Mr. EDMUNDS. That is no objection.
> Mr. CARPENTER. That is a decided objection.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I was not the author of that remark from my seat, or if I was, (which I do not remember,) I thought the speaker was referring to the 4th of March, 1873, as he appears to have been in one part of the phrase. I certainly agree with what the Senator from Wisconsin stated, that we could not with constitutional propriety go back beyond the 4th of March, 1873.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, if we were at this time fixing the mileage of members or their compensation without reference to what has taken place, I am not prepared to say that I should vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. It will be remembered, however, that this is a simple proposition to repeal the law of last session. There are reasons for and against the mileage allowed by the law as it stood before. The committee did not propose to go into those reasons, nor to consider whether they were better on one side or the other of the proposition, but simply to recommend a repeal of the old law and a restoration of the old compensation, leaving the mileage as it stood for a number of years. Now, if, when this law is repealed, it is proposed to change the mileage, I think there will be no objection to it; at least I do not know that I should object to it; and yet there are reasons upon the other side, as I suggest to my friend from Kentucky.

It is utterly impossible for a Senator who comes here from California or Nevada to go home during the session, unless circumstances are such as to make it absolutely necessary. It is impossible for him to attend to any private business. He is compelled to remain here during the session and devote his entire time. A Senator who resides nearer the capital, however, is able, you can see, readily to return home and attend to his private business. If he is a professional man, a lawyer, he can go to his courts; whereas in Iowa, or Nevada, or Nebraska, or California, it is impossible for him to do it. Then, too, this is the mileage that has been established for a number of years.

But without intending to go into the reasons that influenced the committee, all I ask is that we shall stand by this bill as it is. While there are many amendments that I would like to vote for to this bill; while I should have liked to have the bill reported differently from the committee, I trust we shall stand by the bill as it is; and then, if my friend from Kentucky or others should suggest that we change the mileage or that we change the compensation hereafter, let it be done.

So far as the allowance of mere traveling expenses is concerned, in addition to what was said by my friend from Vermont let me suggest this: Some persons have the idea that if they come here upon passes, it is entirely legitimate for them to charge the expenses of travel the same as if they had paid money; others do not regard it as proper to do so; and hence reflections arise and invidious comparisons are made. I therefore think that upon the whole the mileage system is preferable to the other.

I only rose, however, for the purpose of suggesting that I trust we shall stand by this bill as it came from the committee; and then, if it be found hereafter that this mileage system is improperly arranged, let us rearrange it in a subsequent measure, instead of endeavoring to ingraft it upon this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I had no purpose, and have none now, to interfere with the passage of this bill by offering any amendment on compensation or mileage. It occurred to me that to remedy the great abuse of mileage, to which the Senator from Vermont called the attention of the Senate and the country, he could better reach his object by a concurrence in the House bill than by his amendment.

Mr. President, I did not vote for the law of the 3d of March last increasing salaries. I was not in the Chamber when the vote was taken. I did, however, draw the pay allowed under that law. I have retained it, and am willing to bear my just proportion of the responsibility of that measure. I did not consider that I had committed a crime when I drew what the law authorized, both as to the prospective and back pay. I found that all my distinguished predecessors upon this floor and in the other House, of both parties, including such names as Clay, Johnson, Crittenden, Guthrie, Powell, who, in my own State and throughout the confederacy, have always been proudly regarded as patriots, without fear and without reproach, drew both the back and prospective pay under bills precisely similar to this. I have yet to learn that they were ever deemed salary-grabbers or representative men on whose escutcheon the stain of dishonor had ever rested. In drawing that pay I took that which the law gave me.

If in pursuing the course that my judgment commended to me as the proper one for a Senator to pursue my constituents shall condemn me, while I should deeply regret it, I shall prize my own self-respect higher than any position or distinction to be obtained at its sacrifice.

The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] in his remarks on this subject upon yesterday, expressed views in which I, for the most part, heartily concur. I did not consider that I had dishonored my State or dishonored myself in drawing the compensation which was then fixed by law. I shall always honor the enlightened public sentiment of my own State and of the country, and cheerfully bow to it when I can do so without dishonoring myself; and if I believed that the mass of my constituents believed that I had acted improperly or even indelicately, I should deeply regret it.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe there is a Senator within this Chamber who, if he believed his constituents concurred in the sentiment that the present compensation was a just and proper one, would not now gladly approve the measure and retain the entire pay. I should be glad to see a Senator rise in his place to-day and say, his people approving, that the compensation was too high or that any one who had taken it was a salary-grabber.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States, in the organization of this Government, was created by its founders as a bulwark against popular error. I am not one of those who believe that the people can do no wrong. They are subject to the same passions and the same errors that poor humanity is heir to. How often have they in after years welcomed the check which this body has put upon popular excitement, which, could the popular wish under the excitement of the hour have been carried out, would have ended in unwise and impolitic legislation.

I am therefore perfectly willing to take all proper personal responsibility for the passage of the compensation bill on the 3d of March, 1873, though I did not vote for the bill. If I had believed it to be wrong I would have scorned to take the money. I did take it, and I stand by that action. I desire that the people shall fully understand it. If an enlightened and just constituency shall deem that action wrong, while I will cheerfully and willingly bow to their judgment, I shall adhere to the sincerity and integrity of my opinion that the public interest was served in the passage of that bill. I believe when the people come to understand the very important difference between the present bill and the former one, including mileage, stationery, and the franking privilege, they will wonder at the excitement and abuse which the present law has called forth. I have done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment of the committee.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Crozier, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sumner, and Thurman—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Howe, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Patterson, Sargent, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Robertson, Stewart, and Stockton—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAGIN. As I understand the bill as it came from the committee, it seeks to repeal the law of last spring so far as it relates to members of Congress, but the effect will be, should it become a law, that up to the time of its passage we shall receive at the rate of $7,500 a year and traveling expenses, and then be authorized to draw mileage under the revived law. Therefore, I move to add at the end of the first section of the committee's amendment the following:

Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed for the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

There cannot be any objection to that, I think, as we have received our actual traveling expenses.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is in accordance with the spirit of the bill itself, and I think it is what was contemplated by the committee.

Mr. NORWOOD, (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) This is an important amendment, which I desire a night to reflect upon, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Several SENATORS. Try it without the yeas and nays first.

Mr. WRIGHT. I withdraw the call for the present, and let us have a rising vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, the ayes being 17—less than a majority of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

Mr. MORTON. What is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out the first and second sections of the amendment of the committee, and insert the following:

That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874," as provides for the increase of the salaries of the President, Vice-President, Members of Congress, and Delegates, and all other officers therein named, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the salaries and compensation of all said officers, and clerks of every name and description, shall be and remain as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of the act the provisions of which are hereby repealed: Provided, That this repeal, so far as it relates to the salary of the President, shall not take effect until the 4th day of March, 1877, on and after which date said repeal, as to the salary of said officer, shall have full force and effect, and as to all other officers from and after the taking effect of this act: And provided further, That this repeal shall not relate to or affect the salaries of the chief and other justices of the Supreme Court of the United States as now established by law.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I demand the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Secretary read the last clause again—as to how long this present salary is to continue.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this repeal, so far as it relates to the salary of the President, shall not take effect until the 4th day of March, 1877, on and after which date said repeal, as to the salary of said officer, shall have full force and effect, and as to all other officers from and after the taking effect of this act: And provided further, That the repeal shall not relate to or affect the salaries of the chief and other justices of the Supreme Court of the United States as now established by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to move, where this amendment speaks of this act taking effect now, to declare that, in respect to others except the President and the judges, it shall take effect as of the 4th of last March, and that the computation of salaries shall be made accordingly?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is an amendment to an amendment, and such a motion would not be in order at the present time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As soon as it is in order, if I can muster the strength to stay here, I wish to make that motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say, before the vote is taken, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is substantially the bill that I introduced on the first day of the session; and, while I propose to stand by the committee, it will be seen at once that I cannot consistently do otherwise than vote for this amendment. I do that for the reason that I do not understand it to be at all in conflict with the report of the committee, but it only goes one step beyond it and includes other officers. I do this very reluctantly; but, the question being presented, I have no alternative as it seems to me.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask my friend who has charge of this bill whether he thinks that amendment would promote or endanger the passage of his bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. As I am asked the question I will say that I think it would promote the passage of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Then let us vote for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not that strike down the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries?

Several SENATORS. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That leaves the salaries of the assistant secretaries below the salaries of their chief clerks.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I suggest that we can attend to those matters at the proper time; and if necessary a special committee can be appointed to revise the whole subject of salaries.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say one word. If the Senator who has charge of this bill, and who has been appealing all day to us to bring this matter to a conclusion and to keep off all amendments, chooses to abandon the bill at this moment, he probably will not see the end of it until next week.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we had better adjourn, in that case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not propose to stay here, for one, if he abandons it now.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not abandon the bill, but I feel that I cannot do otherwise than vote for this amendment, for I have said from the beginning that I believe in a square repeal of the old law. That is what I do believe in.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have not mingled in this discussion at all, and I did not suppose that I could be provoked to open my lips; but I have a few words that I want to say on this amendment, and to give the reasons why I will not vote for it.

In the first place, it places the President in a position which will be anomalous, and in such a position as the Chief Executive of this nation has never before been placed in. You have established his salary, by the law of last March, at $50,000 per annum. The Constitution provides that it shall remain at that sum during his term of office. You now propose to repeal that law at this time, to take effect three years hence; he, in the mean time, drawing the salary upon a law which he knows has only a limited tenure, and that when he goes out of office his successor will be elected to a compensation one-half that which has been furnished to him. I ask Senators if they are willing to-day to vote for a law that shall put the Executive in that position? I am not; and I do not believe that the people of this country demand it. Is the compensation too much? That is a question which I will not stop now to consider, but I will discuss that matter at the close of this Administration, should I be here, or the Senate can discuss it at the close of the Administration, when, if it should be reduced, will be the appropriate time to do it, and not now.

Sir, as I am on my feet, I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to one or two considerations which have controlled my action and which will control it to the end. I have regarded this increased compensation to members as unfortunate. I said so at the time of the passage of the law, and the event has proved that I was correct. I have been at all times willing and ready to restore the old law—to repeal the law of March last so far as its application was to ourselves, and I was in favor of the House bill in committee, as I am in favor of the House bill here and now, to accomplish that result. It is a matter which pertains to ourselves. I think we had better deal with that subject as the House dealt with it, by itself, and not mingle the salaries of other officers with our own. If it shall be deemed wise and prudent, at the proper time, to reduce the salary of the Executive, I will vote for it. If it shall be deemed prudent and wise to reduce the salaries of some of the heads of the Bureaus and the assistant secretaries, I will vote for it; but there must be other and better arguments than I have yet heard to induce me so to believe, I am willing frankly now to admit.

Now, sir, if you will take the House bill and strike out $6,000 and put in $5,500, and take that bill with no entangling alliances about it, you send it back to the House with the simple proposition of reducing it from $6,000 to $5,500, and then you will cover the amount of compensation, mileage, and incidental sums that were paid to us prior to the passage of the act that established our salaries at $7,500. You will do it smoothly, and you will accomplish the result in that way, and leave all these other questions to be dealt with by themselves and upon their merits, without making other officers in the Government suffer for anything we have done here, or refuse them an adequate compensation in our effort to correct what we may have wrongfully done here. I think that would be the wise course to pursue.

I agree with my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] fully in regard to the mileage. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] because it was a slight reduction in the mileage; but that amendment left that very vexatious question to vex us again hereafter. For long years do we not know that the inequality produced by the system of mileage, established in the early formation of the Government, has been one of the fundamental reasons always argued for changing our compensation? And there is an injustice, a palpable injustice, when you pay one man $5,000 a year and another between seven and eight thousand dollars a year; the one away from his business and away from his home, if he does his duty to the Government, just as long as and just as thoroughly as the man who comes from the Pacific coast.

It was my purpose to move an amendment at the appropriate time, as I shall, to perfect the House bill simply by reducing the $6,000 to $5,500, and then let us pass it. I hold in my hand a computation of the compensation paid to Senators at the last two sessions of the Senate; and I find, taking compensation, mileage, newspapers, and stationery, that in the year 1872 each Senator received $5,525.65; in 1871, taking the same items that were paid to us, I find that each Senator received $5,625.56; the difference arising from the number of Senators by which you divide the sum total, the Senate not being then as full as now. Now, sir, if we take the House bill and put the salary at $5,500, it will be a little inside of what was our old compensation; and in doing that you will remove the objectionable feature in the bill reported by your committee, to wit, that feature which permits the old mileage rule to obtain, although it obtained then to a less extent, and to a still less extent on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont; but its inequality pro rata is precisely the same, and you cannot make any distinction in principle. It is just as unequal.

I know my friend from Vermont says that it is rather obnoxious—that he does not like to render an account of his actual traveling expenses. There may be some slight difficulty in that way, but it is very slight indeed. I think no Senator will be at all unable to determine what is the fair and legitimate amount of his expenses in traveling to and returning from the capital of the country.

For these reasons, thus briefly stated, I favored the House bill in committee, reducing the pay to that sum which would make it equivalent to what was our compensation before the law of last March was passed; and I shall move at the appropriate time to so amend that bill, and then take it as it is.

There is another thing which I think renders it wise that we should do so. I do not think the discussions in this body on this subject have redounded to the credit of the body or of the country, and I had hoped that we should have gotten through with this bill without one word of discussion. I ought not, perhaps, to say that, inasmuch as I have finally been provoked into saying these few words. If we act as I suggest, it will send the bill back to the House in a better form, and in a form, I think I have a right to say, which will conform to what was the vote of that body of instructions to its committee. I will not vote to put the President of the United States in the position in which this amendment will put him. I will not vote to put our assistant secretaries at a compensation lower than their clerks under them, and I do prefer myself to vote for the House bill with the change which I have suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Saulsbury, Schurz, Stevenson, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conover, Cragin, Crozier, Dorsey, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Wadleigh, and West—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Chandler, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Logan, Robertson, Stewart, and Stockton—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now move to add to the amendment just adopted, in line 13, after the word "repeal," these words:

Which salaries shall be computed to take effect as of the 4th of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Trearury are hereby directed to make the computation accordingly, and to apportion such deduction from salaries already received as shall be necessary to carry this provision into effect.

I believe that covers the idea.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall have to reduce it to writing, because the Clerk cannot read it without. I am sorry to take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If I understand it, this proposition of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is the same as that offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is substantially the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS proceeded to prepare his amendment at his desk.

Mr. LEWIS. If it is in order, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the floor, I believe, proposing an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will now read the amendment, and then the Clerk can probably read it also. It is in substance what I believe has been proposed before in connection with other things and rejected, and I wish the Senate, without any debate on my part, to take a direct vote upon this question. Where the pending amendment provides that the salaries shall be, and remain fixed as by law in force at the time of the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, the provisions of which are hereby repealed, I propose to insert:

And the reduction of salaries herein provided for shall take effect as of the 4th day of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall compute the same accordingly, and shall make ratable monthly deductions from said salaries at the rate necessary to effectuate this provision within nine months next hereafter.

That is, I divide up the rebate by the period of nine months.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the amendment read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg that the Secretary will read what precedes that, so that we may see the context.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 13, after the word "repealed," insert——

Mr. CONKLING. Please read a line or two back.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words preceding the proposed amendment are:

And the salaries and compensation of all said officers and clerks of every name and description shall be and remain as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of the act the provisions of which are hereby repealed.

Then the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to insert at this point:

And the reduction of salaries herein provided for shall take effect as of the 4th day of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall compute the same accordingly, and shall make ratable monthly deductions from said salaries at the rate necessary to effectuate this provision within nine months next hereafter

Mr. CONKLING. The reading of that part of the amendment does not enable us to understand what officers these provisions cover; but if the mover of the amendment will state, that may answer for the purpose of enlightening us as to its effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It covers all the officers whose salaries were raised except the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and the President of the United States, in respect to whom there is an exceptive provision further on.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will let us take a vote on this.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. You cannot take the vote now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; we can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 40, noes 16.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 8, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REFUND OF TAXES.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. The Committee on Ways and Means direct me to report back the following resolution, and to recommend its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House the amount of money refunded since March 4, 1873, on account of customs duties and internal taxes previously paid into the Treasury, the names of the persons to whom paid, and the amount to each, respectively, and upon what articles the said refund was made, together with a recital of the reasons for said payment, and the laws under which the payment was made.

The resolution was agreed to.

MILWAUKEE HARBOR.

Mr. MITCHELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House any supplementary or additional report he has received with respect to the condition and needs of the harbor of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, since the transmission to this House of his last annual report.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1028) to regulate the issue of certificates or patents for lands granted to railroads or other companies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM SAUNDERS.

Mr. CLEMENTS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1029) for the relief of William Saunders; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDIO RESERVATION.

Mr. CLAYTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1030) leasing the Presidio Reservation to the city of San Francisco for a public park; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Edward Young of a present from the Emperor of Russia.

NEW MEXICO PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. PACKARD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on two private land claims in said Territory; which was recommitted to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

W. B. CRITCHFIELD AND H. L. ANDERSON.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1031) for the relief of W. B. Critchfield and H. L. Anderson, formerly of the Thirteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the regular order.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been called, the morning hour begins at eighteen minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund, and to apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. KASSON. The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has suggested to me that inasmuch as we have but the morning hour this morning, to be followed by the naval bill, it would be better to postpone the further consideration of this bill until some day when more time can be devoted to it. If there is no objection to that I am willing that it shall be done.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I said, not that it was my desire, but that if it was the desire of the Committee on Appropriations I would very cheerfully accede to it.

The SPEAKER. If that be done, a day for its consideration had better be named now, so that the bill may be taken out of the morning hour.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That I do not want to do. I understand that the Committee on Appropriations have no such wish; and therefore we will proceed with the bill now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must impress upon gentlemen the necessity, when a bill is in the morning hour, of disposing of it as soon as possible, so that the call of committees may proceed. It is difficult, even at the best, to get through with all the committees.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I did not express any other desire than to consider this bill this morning, but I thought it might be the desire of the Committee on Appropriations to go on with their business to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations are not entitled to the consideration of their business until after the morning hour.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations are prepared to call up their bill after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor for thirty-five minutes.

Mr. KASSON. Until yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the general scope and effect of this bill presented by the Committee on Education and Labor, and had no intention of asking the attention of the House to the consideration of the questions involved in it. During the debate of yesterday, upon an examination of the bill, I found that it involved both principles and results worthy of an unusually serious consideration on the part of the members of this House before it should be passed.

I wish to say, preliminarily to what I have to offer upon the bill, that no man on this floor can have a more sincere appreciation of the labors of that committee, and of the patriotism, ability, and sincerity of the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] who has the bill in charge, than I have myself. Let us at the beginning eliminate from this discussion any possible misapprehension of the feeling of the American House of Representatives touching the importance of the education of the masses of the people of this country. No man from any congressional district in the United States will rise on this floor and interpose any objection to those measures which are legitimate and proper and effective for educating the masses of the people of this country. Let us, then, leave out of the discussion any possible misconception upon this subject. Be the member democrat or republican, he is in favor of the education of the masses of the people; or, if not, I do not believe he could ever again find a seat on this floor.

But hitherto in the history of the country this whole question of the education of the people has been submitted to the States and Territories of the Union and to the people thereof. This bill therefore endeavors to introduce a new scheme for the education of the people; to call into exercise new powers on the part of the Federal Government of this country.

My first objection to the bill, to which I call attention, has respect to the details of it, that gentlemen may not fail to see the character of the provisions by which it is proposed to carry into effect the theory of the bill. In the very title of the bill it proposes to take charge of this question of the education of the people. It does not propose, as has been the case with former donations by the Congress of the United States for such purposes, to give certain funds to the control of the States of this Union, to be by them applied to the education of the people; it proposes itself to take charge in part of the education of the people of the United States.

Sir, the States of this Union have varying provisions for applying public funds to these uses. They have their own theories of the most effective mode in which the education of the masses can be effected. They have their own systems of administration for this purpose.

This bill proposes to introduce to some extent an arbitrary system of administration for the benefit of education. In the first section it also declares that the net proceeds of the public lands shall be forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people without limitation. In the last section it provides that nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the 5 per cent. clause existing in the laws in respect to the proceeds of the public lands—leaving, it seems to me, a partial conflict to which I call the attention of members. That, however, is a matter of detail.

When you come to consider further the details of the bill you find that the distribution of this money is to be made upon a different basis from that which, so far as I know, exists in any State in the Union. In the fourth section of the bill it provides that the distribution shall be made according to the numbers of the population of the respective States of ten years old and upward who cannot write, a basis of distribution that I think does not exist in any State in this Union. In subsequent clauses it also provides for the partial regulation of the duties of State officers, officers appointed under State constitutions, officers regulated by State laws, officers over whom we, in the Congress of the United States, have no more control than we have over the governor of any State in the Union.

It will be found that, in the ninth section, the bill imposes duties on "the superintendent of public instruction of each State and Territory and of said District, or such other officer as shall by the laws of such State, Territory, or District be required so to do." It is proposed to require the performance of these duties under a law of the United States. I repeat, we have no more right to impose a duty upon a State officer than we have to regulate the administration of the governor of a State.

Mr. MONROE. Will the gentleman yield to me just one moment? With his consent, I desire to call his attention and the attention of the House to the fact that these duties are to become the duties of State officers only on condition that the State voluntarily accepts the benefit offered, and itself imposes these duties.

Mr. KASSON. The provision in that respect is simply that the State shall accept the grant on its condition, and it proposes, by a contract between a State and the United States, to regulate directly by acts of Congress the duties of State officers, which I hold cannot constitutionally be done.

You have the right to give a grant to a State of this Union, and to impose conditions on the grant; but you have no right by a contract between a State and the United States to impose administrative duties directly on an officer of any State of this Union. I challenge gentlemen to point me to one law upon the statute-books of the United States, during nearly a century of relations between the Federal Government and the State governments, which involves this principle of the direct imposition of duties by law of Congress upon State officers, and seeking to make the imposition effective in the manner contemplated by this bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If it does not disturb the gentleman for me to make the suggestion, I would like him to point out the distinction in this respect between this bill and the argicultural-college act of 1863, or some forty railroad grants of the public lands which Congress has made.

Mr. KASSON. I will do so with pleasure when I come to consider the relation of the bill to the public lands.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. But my suggestion relates to the point the gentleman is now making. He denies, as I understand, the constitutionality of a contract which undertakes to bind State officers to perform their local duties in a certain way. He affirms that this bill introduces a new principle, although it is put in the form of a condition; to which I reply, that in my judgment (and I wish to see whether the gentleman differs with me on this point) there is no more the making of a contract in this case than in the imposition of conditions upon a State in railroad grants—the grants, for instance, to Massachusetts, Maine, and a great many other States, or the grants for agricultural colleges under the legislation of 1863. In other words, it is simply proposed to provide that a State which has done something one year shall have a certain sum of money the next year.

Mr. KASSON. In reply to that point I shall speak as fully as the gentleman desires when I come to consider the relation of the bill to the public-land system. At present I only say, that in all those cases we have required legislation by the State as a condition of the acceptance of the benefits of the grant. We have never ourselves legislated in the manner proposed in this bill, by undertaking to impose duties directly upon the officers of the State; and it has been repeatedly decided that we have no power to impose such duties on a State officer.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman maintain that a grant of land by Congress can derive validity from the action of a State Leigslature?

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, I say that this bill does not propose to make the exercise of this authority by Congress conditional upon State legislation. It provides that the State shall accept the grant upon the terms of the bill; and then Congress itself undertakes to tell the State officers what their duty shall be. I hope the distinction is plain.

Mr. RANDALL. The result is the same. We lose the land ineither case.

Mr. KASSON. The results may be the same; but in one case they may be accomplished by a violation of the Constitution, and in the other not.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there was such a violation in the cases to which I refer.

Mr. KASSON. However that may be, at any rate this bill is a palpable, original effort on the part of Congress to establish relations of control over the officers of a State.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, in the eleventh section of the bill it is provided that—

The officer or officers, person or persons, willfully so misapplying, misappropriating, squandering, or embezzling such funds, or knowingly consenting thereto, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by fine in double the amount so misapplied, misappropriated, squandered, or embezzled, or by imprisonment not less than one nor more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

And the twelfth section declares—

That the circuit courts of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all offenses committed against the provisions of this act.

Now, what is the position in which we are placed by this bill? You impose duties on State officers who have also duties under State laws. In construing your two systems they may misappropriate or misapply moneys coming into their hands; and if they should do so, the courts of the United States are to have exclusive jurisdiction of the question of their punishment; and the jurisdiction of the State courts as to the action of its own officers in the distribution of this fund is entirely taken away.

I insist, therefore, that in the respects I have named we cannot accept this bill without introducing a new theory of central administration by this Government with relation to the States of this Union. So much is all I care to say upon the details of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to ask the attention of the House to the other point, the point of the general constitutional position into which this bill seems to drift us. The States of the Union, and particularly the land States of the West, by virtue of the grants of land made to them for educational purposes—made to them without any effort to control their State officers, but simply providing the object of the grant of public lands—have realized large sums of money from those grants, which have either been deposited in the State treasury or invested in bonds, the annual proceeds of which are applied to the education of the people. In my own State, the State of Iowa, we have a fund of about three million dollars, annually increasing by the wise action of our State government. We have also a system of distribution of the proceeds of this fund, and we distribute it to the county officers, and the county officers to their subordinate officers, and upon a well-known basis, ascertained by State census and State laws and with respect to certain classes of scholars. This bill proposes to impose a new class of duties upon those officers, and I will state what I should have said in speaking of the details of the bill, that it seems to bring the United States Government into direct contact with the school districts of the States.

I call the attention of the House to the ninth section, which provides—

That the superintendent of public instruction of each State and Territory and of said District, or such other officer as shall by the laws of such State, Territory, or District be required so to do, shall, immediately upon the receipt of the certificate provided in section 4, proceed to apportion the amount so certified to his State, Territory, or District to the several school districts therein, &c.

That is to say, it shall have no intermediate mode of distribution in harmony with the law of the States; which law in my own State is, that it shall be apportioned through the county officers, and not directly to the school districts; thus running directly across the system under the State laws.

Then, again, in the tenth section is the other provision to which I have alluded—

That the amount apportioned to the school districts of any State or Territory, or of the District of Columbia, and certified as herein provided, shall be paid upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Interior, out of the Treasury of the United States.

I do not wish to misconstrue this bill, but it seems to me to imply that warrants are to be issued from the Treasury of the United States by United States officers to the school districts of this Union. The subsequent part of the tenth section speaks of its being distributed to the proper State officers, but the first portion of the section seems to indicate that there are to be separate apportionments here in Washington, directly to the school districts, which are to be sent to the proper officers of the State. There being doubt about it, I do not know whether the committee understood that language as I have indicated, but unless the words "school districts" are stricken out it bears that construction.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House particularly to this fact, that we are endeavoring by this bill to move further in the direction which was rendered necessary by the war, but which has ceased to be necessary with the declaration of peace. Sir, in this Congress we have fought many battles in which, under the so-called war-power of the Union, we have assumed powers of a very dangerous character, but also of a very necessary character at the time. During the continuance of the war we gathered great powers into this body, and, to secure the fruits of the war, we amended the Constitution so as to get still further powers for a condition of peace. I ask gentlemen now whether, when the Constitution has been amended as thoroughly as any gentleman desires, and when we are in a condition of peace and restored Union, there is a man upon this floor who desires in any respect to further centralize the Government at this time? I ask what clause of the Constitution can bring us into connection with the school districts of the different States of this Union? I wish some member of the committee would point me to a clause of the Constitution, or to any amendment of the Constitution, that brings the Congress of the United States into contact with subdivisions of States of this Union, known as school districts, and with teachers' wages therein. I know of none. I know of no power in that instrument by which we can touch the school districts of this Union in the manner of regulation; and yet this bill provides for the payment of the salaries of the teachers of a certain class of school districts in the several States; it provides for a certain class of scholars that shall be entitled to the benefits of the fund appropriated from the people's Treasury, to the exclusion of others.

Sir, I say it is a stretch of power which, as a member of the republican party, I repudiate as not being within the range of the powers of the Congress of the United States. I have stood upon this floor in times of danger, and have advocated the use of all the powers that could be gathered to strengthen the hands of the Government; but I am here to-day to protest with all my force against taking away one solitary State or municipal right that exists now in this free Union.

Sir, the great pendulum of the clock of history is moving ever to and fro. After reaching one extremity it is bound to go back toward the other extremity. We reached the extreme in one direction during the war, and now the pendulum has commenced sweeping in the other direction. If gentlemen on this floor are not wise, we shall find ourselves now, with the views we entertain as the majority, imploring Heaven to come to our help to prevent these powers being turned against us and our dearest home interests. Can no gentleman on this side of the House imagine such a political revolution in the future as shall take from men of our views the power on this floor, and at the other end of the Capitol? Can they not see, then, that the principles established in this bill will put us, perhaps, under a majority here who do not appreciate our municipal organizations of the North, our school-district system and its value; who may, like we are doing now, put the strong hand of the Federal Government upon the dearest rights which we cherish in the States to which we belong and which we love? Everybody, sir, who looks at all to the philosophy of history must see that the time has come when we must heed the swinging of this great constitutional pendulum, when we must guard against the extreme to which we shall inevitably drift, unless we commence early to apply the steadying powers of a more wise and constant and peaceful judgment.

Sir, we are going rapidly at this time upon the great railroad train which bears public affairs. Put on the brakes upon expenditures; put on the brakes upon establishing new powers in the Congress of the United States; put on the brakes against creating for the first time in the Treasury of the United States a permanent public fund to be paid out in driblets from year to year to the school districts in the several States of this Union. We want no additional duties, no additional powers, which interfere with or exclude the exercise of the powers of our States in times of peace.

So much, Mr. Speaker, for the constitutional considerations which apply to the bill now before the House.

Now, sir, I ask attention to its relation to the public-land system; and here I ask gentlemen who come from parts of the country which know nothing of our land system of the West, its history and its administration, to a few very plain statements and observations on that question. In those States we know and feel alike the benefits and the evils that have attended the system of that administration. Our States in the Northwest are made up of sections of the public lands which have been subject from time to time to the legislation of Congress. No man can fail to look with anything else than glorious admiration upon that vast domain which came to us from our fathers. No man can fail to look with anything else than admiration upon the fruits of the policy which kept these lands open to entry at a low price to the children of the older States and to emigrants from foreign countries. While that system continued in its purity the tide of emigration advanced steadily from the Alleghany Mountains westward to the Mississippi River. It populated vacant districts; it built wagon-roads; it cultivated the soil; it gave homes to the poor. It gave these lands to the people of the older States and to the emigrating people of the Old World as almost a free gift. It gave homes to the children of poverty in this and other countries who came to us. How did you change that policy, members of Congress? You proposed, and largely at the request of us from the West—I admit it—you proposed to commence making enormous grants of that public land to corporations who took it away from the control of the settlers and from the control of the Government of the United States, and thus you put millions upon millions of acres under the control of great corporations whose sole interest was to make the most money possible out of their grants. What has been the effect to-day? Why, sir, the Government failed to keep its title in these lands, or within its power the fixing of the price, but left it to these corporations to fix that price and the time of sale; and the result has been what I, in many weary journeys across the prairies, have seen, time and again.

Gentlemen, if you could have traveled there, and at evening arrived where a stream runs through the prairies, and seen the group of emigrant-wagons, with the poor man, his wife and children, building scanty fires upon the ground to cook their supper, all engaged hunting public lands upon which they could settle, but who from day to day were forced to travel many scores of miles, finding section after section open and untilled, but in the hands of corporations or of non-resident speculators who had lifted the price so high that they could not buy the land—if you had seen these things day after day and month after month, then you would begin to understand what I mean when I speak of the evils of the present land system of this country. If you had seen all this you would recognize the justice of my protest against any continuation of that system.

It is not railroad corporations alone which have brought about these evils. You allowed your public lands to be sold for the purpose of putting money into the Treasury, when the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were a large part of the revenue of the Government. Now, on the contrary, they constitute but a small part; and you propose to leave them open still for entry by anybody, whether he wants to cultivate the soil or not. Sir, in this respect you have violated what has become patent to us now as a sound and necessary principle of administration of the public lands. Why do millions of acres in our States of this public land lie fruitless? God Almighty gave it not to you or to me to speculate with. He gave it to the laboring man to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow, and you have given it to speculators who have hoarded it, and who have refused the poor man an opportunity to secure a home. You have given it to still further enrich the rich men who have made it inaccessible to the laborer and the poor man. You have violated the law of the Almighty and the best interests of the United States of America.

In the Thirty-sixth Congress—I think it was—you commenced reforming. You passed your homestead law in spite of capitalists and speculators, and you gave the privilege to the poor man to settle upon any land the title of which was in the United States, and provided, should he till and cultivate it and make bread out of it, that he would have it for nothing, or next to nothing. Then, sir, you also established, prior to that, a preemption law to enable a man to go on and cultivate land before he could get his title, on condition that he would improve it. Under that, also, the speculator has grasped hundreds and thousands of acres by hiring fictitious settlers to go on and build cabins, holding it long enough to get his title for the speculator, who will proceed to hoard it as the miser hoards his money.

Now, for these reasons, and because this bill intends to perpetuate a system of speculation in the public lands—for these reasons we have found it indispensable, to take further steps in the West and Northwest, to call the attention of the gentlemen in this House, who appreciate the sound policy applicable to public lands, to these points and to reform. Why, sir, I can point you to one county in my State, the county of Ida, where to-day I think over one-half of all the land in the county is unoccupied, while counties are better settled all around it, because, being a late county for settlement, the railroads absorbed—first, under the alternate-section grant, and then under the additional grant to enable them to obtain what they might have obtained if no lands had been settled—because, I say, the railroad companies absorbed those lands, got the title from your Government, hoarded them, and lifted the prices so high that no poor man could go on and settle and till those lands. And what has been the effect of such a policy? The lands never have been improved. There is no enhancement of value by improvement of land in the county. All local county expenses are paid by the few instead of the many. Our taxes are increased. And so your wealthy capitalists in the East, who own these large bodies of land, invest in and hold them as a profitable investment for the next generation. I could mention names—but I do not desire to do it here—of men who have tens and fifties of thousands of acres. One of these gentlemen, distinguished in the history of this country, told me that notwithstanding all the loss of interest on his money, all the loss by the taxation which he had paid, his holding land for twenty-five years had netted him more than any other investments he had made.

I know a wealthy manufacturing concern in the State of Rhode Island whose policy is, never to sell, always to buy, who are holding fast thousands of acres in my State to-day, and which cannot be settled except at extravagant prices; and immigrants are forced westward, and far west.

Now, are gentlemen prepared to continue this policy? Are you prepared to allow speculators still to go on and absorb these vast lands of the West? Is your legislation still to be continued in the direction of aiding the rich man's capital; or will you legislate in the aid of the poor man's hopes? This is no question of demagogery. It is a solid question of fact connected with the public interest of this country. Capital always knows how to take care of itself. The poor immigrant to whom I have alluded, driven from one State to another by stress of circumstances; the son of the poor farmer, who takes a wife, and, being allowed by his father a pair of horses and a wagon, goes to seek a new home on vacant lands—and these amount to hundreds of thousands—all these are profoundly interested in this question whether you are going to let them have homes in the future, or will you continue to give the speculator the first opportunity of obtaining lands by purchase from the United States Government?

Mr. Speaker, I earnestly entreat the members of this House to review this question of land reform. It is a question deeply concerning every citizen, particularly of the Northwest; and if you will be pleased to reflect upon it, you will see that it concerns your laboring men and your poor men in all the States of the Union. Why, sir, it is but a few days since we saw thousands of laborers resolving in their poverty, in the cities, that the municipal governments should give them bread at once, or threatening them with fearful demonstrations if they did not. Now, if you take a policy which is going to disable you from saying to them, "Go upon the lands of the United States and earn bread for your children, and get the lands for nothing," then you must not be surprised if the demands of your laborers in the East become more aggressive and more fearful as time wears on. Come back to the original policy; come back to the idea that God gave the land to be cultivated. Let no man purchase the public domain unless at the same time he goes upon it and puts it to the use that the Almighty intended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will consent to the gentleman from Iowa being allowed to continue his remarks.

There was no objection to an extension of time.

Mr. KASSON. I hope, sir, that no gentleman will consider these remarks, in the light of the facts to which I have alluded, as unduly radical. They are earnest, because I feel earnestly. They are earnest, because I look to the future of my country. They are earnest, because I look to the hundreds of thousands who come here annually to our shore from foreign countries, in the hope of finding our public domain accessible to them. I speak earnestly because, unwarily, heretofore this House has taken action which interferes with the permanent prosperity of our country. Sir, look at the millions of acres—I have the statistics here, but cannot read them—look at the millions of acres that have been taken entirely away from the range of the men who till the soil; vast millions of the richest lands of the country. Recollect that we are being rapidly led to that condition in which we shall have only mountains and dry plains to give to the poor immigrant. Then remember that you are asked now to introduce and adopt a system that contemplates the continual sale of these public lands to any speculator who desires to possess them. Remember, too, that with his capital he can, and does, send out agents to pick out the choicest and richest lands, which ought to be reserved for the actual settlers by the Government, but which he holds for that advanced price which he sees coming with the future prosperity of the country. Let any man from the Northwest upon this floor say if I am not giving a true picture of our later land system and of its effects. It is known to be true by every one, and a clamor comes up from thousands of our constituents demanding of the Congress of the United States the consideration of this subject and the introduction of proper reforms.

Sir, I had hoped that the House would see fit to consider favorably, and that the Committee on the Public Lands would report, a proposition which I introduced and which is before that committee. That proposition is, that at the end of the first century of the existence of the Government of the United States it shall shut down upon all disposition of our public lands except to the men who till them. That bill is pending; and this bill ought not to be acted on, unless adversely, until the Committee on the Public Lands have reported on the other bill. After one hundred years of a system of wild donations and grants and land speculation, leading to a vast diminution of the public domain, the time has come when on the return of that great anniversary—on the 4th of July, 1876—there should not be a land warrant, or land scrip floating, or any floating claim to an acre of this vast inheritance of our countrymen. We should then proclaim to the people of this country and to immigrants from the whole world that from that anniversary not an acre of land shall be taken from the public domain except by men who will settle upon it and make bread out of the soil. That will be a glorious consummation of our first centennial anniversary—a triumph greater than what I hope will be the brilliant triumph of the centennial exhibition. I ask the members of the House to take these reforms into consideration, and to consider them favorably if the views I have presented commend themselves to their judgments. Let us reject every theory under which the public lands of the country may be accumulated by speculators and land-grabbers, instead of distributed to the actual occupant and tiller of the soil.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, obtained the floor.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The gentleman from Tennessee yields to me for a moment, simply to say, as an amicable reply to the gentleman from Iowa, that it is impossible to believe that he has read the bill which he has been discussing. The bill contains absolutely no such provisions as he has discussed in either branch of his argument. It does not interfere with, postpone, affect, or delay the policy of reserving the public lands for actual settlers. It simply declares that as long as they are sold for money their proceeds shall be applied to the education of the children of the country. The bill does not contain a provision which undertakes to interfere with, prescribe, or affect the duties of any State officer, the character of the children who shall be received into the schools, or the management of those schools, or the conduct of their teachers. But it simply declares that when a State for one year has established a common-school system, and has reported to the General Government how many children it has got in its schools, it shall next year have its share of those proceeds of the public lands which have been paid into the Treasury. Now, I am forced to believe, by my respect for the candor and integrity of the gentleman from Iowa, that when he made his argument it was intended for some distant audience and not for the House.

Mr. BECK. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts sits down I desire to ask him a question, and I ask it because he is better informed than any one else about this bill. By a provision of section 5 the benefits of the bill are confined to such States as will provide by law before January, 1875, for the free education of all their children; and by the provision of section 11 it provides—

> That the conditions herein prescribed may be subject to such modification or addition as Congress may hereafter deem necessary for the better accomplishment of the purposes of this act.

The question I desire to ask is, whether the bill does not apply the proceeds of the public lands which belong to all the people of all the States, to such States only as see fit to conform to the act of Congress, and to deprive all those States of any part of the public money which refuse to comply with all the terms which Congress has prescribed or may hereafter prescribe? I ask him, further, whether he thinks that is constitutional?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I understand that every State in the Union claims to have provided by law for the free education of all its children. If, however, any State has not so provided, this bill simply requires that it shall engage to do so. It is true that the State that will not provide a common-school system at all will not get its share of this fund, just as, in a similar case, a State that would not establish an agricultural college did not get its share of the lands granted in 1863 for agricultural colleges. Every grant of the public lands, from the time of the administration of Washington down, to the States for educational or railroad purposes, has been made on some condition, which the State or recipient might comply with or not as it saw fit; and if it did not comply with the condition, then to that extent, it is true, the distribution of the public lands was not equal; that is, the State that did not want the lands on that condition was not obliged to take them.

Mr. KASSON. One word only in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] that my argument, that this bill contemplates a continuance of the speculative system, was unfounded. Sir, the first two lines of the bill declare—

> That the net proceeds of the public lands are hereby forever consecrated and set apart for the education of the people.

Does the gentleman tell me that does not contemplate a permanent continuance of the sales? It says, "forever consecrated." Does he tell me that I am mistaken when I say this bill proposes to legislate in reference to State officers, when it proposes to punish them for embezzlement, misappropriation, and misapplication? Does he say that it does not put them under Federal jurisdiction, when the bill provides that no court but the circuit or district court of the United States shall take cognizance of questions arising under this act? Does he say there is no ground for the argument that this bill seeks to get hold of State officers?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. When the bill declares that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be forever consecrated to this purpose, it does not imply that there shall be proceeds forever, but that whatever proceeds there are shall be forever so consecrated. In the next place I concede that if a State officer steals the money of this fund, then under this bill he will be taken charge of and punished by the courts of the United States. But there is no interference with State rights in providing that a State officer shall not steal the money of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. One word: I omitted to state that when we last year had this bill under consideration, the Treasury was full of money from the proceeds of taxation. That is not the case now. Whatever we now appropriate for this purpose must be raised by taxing the people.

Mr. DEWITT. I desire to have printed an amendment which I propose to offer to this bill—to strike out the proviso of section 4, as follows:

> Provided, however, That for the first five years the distribution of the said fund to and among the several States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, shall be made according to the numbers of their respective population of ten years old and upward who cannot write, as shown, from time to time, by the last preceding published census of the United States.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have prepared a substitute for this bill, which I will offer if I have the opportunity. I do not ask to have it read, but I ask that it may be printed.

It was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, no one was more interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] than I was, because I was anxious to ascertain the condition of the public domain; and a Representative coming from a State that so boasts upon this floor that they have a school fund of $3,000,000, certainly understands the operation of the land system in the State from which he comes. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] to some extent replied to the remarks to which I intended to address myself.

This bill when it was discussed last January, notwithstanding it was passed by a good substantial majority here, was subject, to say the least of it, to the same misapprehension that it has met with this morning at the hands of the gentleman from Iowa. This bill does not propose to interfere in any one single particular with the land laws of the country to-day. It does not propose to change a single statute; it does not propose to change a single officer; it does not propose to make a single change in existing laws. The speech of the gentleman was a very good one, but it does not fit the proposition under consideration to-day.

The gentleman may talk about railroad monopolies, and land grants, and homes for the homeless. This bill provides better things for the poor and the downtrodden and oppressed, about which he talked to-day so eloquently. It provides food for the mind, which is worth more than land for the foreigner and poor man of the country to cultivate. This bill does not propose to take away the pre-emption that he talks so much about, nor the homestead. It leaves the laws as they exist to-day, providing that every citizen, that every downtrodden and oppressed foreigner who may land upon the shores of our country, may enter one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, and, after remaining thereon a sufficient time, receive a patent therefor.

The objection raised by the gentleman from Iowa is not new to the advocates of this bill. The doctrine of State rights comes from a strange section of the country. If it had emanated from my own State, or from any of the other Southern States that made a little experiment in State rights a few years ago, it might have seemed more natural. But it comes from the far distant West, from a State that is reveling in the wealth of a school fund of millions which the Government gave them to educate their poor children. That State now refuses a little pittance to the old States of this Union, which gave the Northwest every foot of land which she now possesses. When we come here and ask a little pittance out of the proceeds of the public lands, we are told that it is interfering with State rights, because we provide that if a fellow steals the money of the United States he shall be indicted, tried, and punished in the courts of the United States, because he steals the money that the United States gave the poor old States of this Union to educate her illiterate children.

I think that if we would look a little more to personal rights, and disregard State rights, our population would be in a better condition in regard to education than they are, according to the official figures, in my own State and other States of this Union that are asking a small pittance from the proceeds of the public lands to assist in the education of their children.

Does this bill propose to interfere with the States? No, sir; it contains no such proposition. There is in this bill no line, word, or syllable seeking to interfere in the least with any State regulation so far as common schools are concerned. It says, as many previous laws have said, that if the Federal Government makes a grant of land, the State or corporation or other party receiving it shall do certain things before acquiring any rights under the grant. What are the States required to do by this bill? To raise a certain amount of money, to provide for a census of the scholastic population, to make a report, receive a certificate, &c. The bill does not propose to create a single new officer. It proposes to impose only two or three new duties, which are simple, plain, and inexpensive, relating merely to putting the State in a condition to receive the pittance contemplated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL]—for he is my friend—startled the supporters of this measure yesterday by turning a most remarkable somersault. Last January he made a most eloquent, independent, bold, and courageous speech on this subject; and if there is any one thing I admire it is courage, moral or physical. When I compare his speech of yesterday with his speech last January, I find that the gentleman has experienced a most remarkable change of head and heart. [Laughter.] I ask the Clerk to read a few paragraphs from the speech made by the gentleman last January.

The Clerk read as follows:

The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Shellabarger) this morning has made an explanation in relation to the remarks which he made the other day, and which I felt that he was bound to make, because the bill is not at all open to the construction which he gave to it. Simply the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are dedicated for this purpose, to aid all the States in the establishment of free education. I have myself never questioned but what it was in the power of Congress to dedicate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for such a purpose. Years ago Congress by an act gave to the new States, many of them one section, and many others two sections, in each township, for educational purposes. That provision of law was never questioned, the constitutionality of it, even at that time, nor is it questioned at the present time.

* * * * * * *

Some amendments have been indicated here to which I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment. Some of those amendments, I think, should not receive the consideration and approval of this House. If this bill is worth anything, it is because it is in the interest of universal education, free education of all the children in the land, no matter what may have been their former condition, no matter what may be their color; their free education, because they are a part and parcel of the people of the country about which we are legislating, and in the interest of which we purpose to legislate.

The point which the gentleman from New Hampshire made the other day against this bill was that it would give to some States but a few thousand dollars. To Tennessee, for instance, it would give forty or fifty thousand dollars. But no matter what the amount may be, if it be only $10,000, if that $10,000 shall warm into life a system that shall ultimately culminate in a well-organized scheme of free education it will have done its work, and I will vote for it as readily as though the donation were half a million. With this educational want staring me in my face, and with the hope and belief that that small sum might work that grand result, I am unable to withhold my vote. It needs sometimes just a little sum of money to be the kernel, so to speak, from which there shall germinate and spring into being a full and well-rounded system.

We do not want any of the money in our State. Thanks to the General Government, we have received for educational purposes two sections of land to the town line; and we have prospectively a fund of $15,000,000. We guarded our educational fund by wise legislation; and no part of our school lands has been sold at less than five dollars an acre, and none can be. We do not want it. But suppose we were to put into the bill a provision giving the proceeds of these public lands to a mere section of the country, then it would be argued that these lands belong to the people, to all of the people, and the proceeds must be divided according to population.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman a question. The bill says the proceeds of the public lands are to be consecrated forever to the purpose of education. Does that mean that the public lands hereafter are all to be sold, and the proceeds kept for that purpose?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not understand that the bill interferes at all with the policy of the past, or with the policy of the future, with regard to the public lands. If I believed that by voting for this bill I should indirectly at any time lessen the liberality of our legislation in regard to the actual settlers or the soldiers, to whom I trust that Congress will grant a bounty, I would not vote for it. Nor would I vote for it if thereby Congress would be less ready to vote lands for needed internal development. The proceeds of so many of the public lands as may be sold are to be consecrated to the purpose of education.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one or two other points before I close. I support this bill from the hope that it will furnish some good stimulus to the organization of public-school systems in those States where that system is most needed. The sum is said to be small. It may prove enough to bring about the needed organization. But £500 were given to Harvard, and out of it has sprung Harvard College. But a small sum may do the work. One, or two, or five, or ten, or twenty, or forty, educational people in those States may gather about this sum, and persevere in the work of organization, and it will widen and spread, I hope, until we find in those States well-developed school systems. With this hope I support this bill, as voting nationally and not locally. We want universal education in this Republic. We want educated masses. Ignorance is fearful. It is to be dreaded everywhere. Let light go forth. Let education everywhere triumph; free education, universal education. In this we trust, and in that is our only hope.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, the remarks just read express my sentiments more fully and forcibly than I can find language to do myself. Yet the gentleman yesterday took the ground that the sum proposed to be distributed by this bill is too small, notwithstanding he reminded us last January that Harvard College, which has done so important an educational work, was started upon an endowment of but £500. And so far as the constitutional question is concerned which was raised by the eloquent gentleman from Iowa, I turn him over to his late ally, my friend from Minnesota, who has so ably answered his constitutional objections in his speech of last January.

Now I have but one word more to say in conclusion. If gentlemen desire to vote against this bill, let them first examine it; for I reiterate here, and reassert, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] did, that there is not a sentence in this bill to which the objection made by the gentleman from Iowa can truly be made to apply.

No deductions can be drawn from the language of this bill like those which the gentleman from Iowa has so eloquently and ably argued.

So far, Mr. Speaker, as my own State of Tennessee is concerned, and so far as my own district is concerned, I ask the passage of this bill as a matter of justice, and as a matter of right. Strange as it may appear, we have a gentleman on this floor, not only a New England man, but a Massachusetts man, coming from a State whose people are perhaps the best educated of any in this Union, whose State according to population pays more to the Government in the way of revenue than any other State of this Union—we see the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I say, earnestly advocating upon this floor the passage of this bill because of its justice, which will take directly two millions of money out of the Treasury of the United States and distribute it for the purpose of educating the illiterate children of other States of the Union. By the census Virginia has 450,893 illiterate persons; Kentucky 332,176, and my own State 354,697. These States, without saying anything of Georgia, Florida, the Carolinas, Alabama, Louisiana and Mississippi, will receive largely under this bill if it should become a law. The great bulk of the money here provided for will be distributed to those States by virtue of this bill; for it provides that the fund shall not only be distributed according to the scholastic population, but according to illiteracy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, State rights, I trust, will not be intervened to prevent the poor people of the country from receiving this educational fund. The idea of centralization which emanates from the North so suddenly and so unexpectedly I trust will not drive any one away from voting for this fund for the education of poor children all over the country.

Let us vote for the passage of the bill, so that the poor children everywhere may at least learn to read and write, and be able especially to read the Scriptures, so that they may know something of their creation and destiny. I sincerely trust that the great Northwest, which has received nine-tenths of the benefits arising from public lands, where they have magnificent school systems, with boasted millions, independent of Congress, because they have received all they asked from Congress and have now all they want and are full and running over—I sincerely trust they will not now fold their arms and sound their trumpets to warn the Northwest members they have gone so far in swinging the pendulum, that it must never swing any more for anybody else. They have not only obtained grants of lands for railroads, but for agricultural colleges and schools, and for every other imaginable purpose, and after they have received those grants they now come and talk of the pendulum swinging to an extreme. All then was bright and lovely, and there was not the least doubt of its constitutionality, at least on their part.

Now, however, when you propose to give to the poor people of the South who are down trodden and oppressed, then we are told it is unconstitutional. You can donate ten millions at one stroke for a railroad through Iowa and the Northwest, and it is constitutional and proper; but when it is proposed to give to the States of the South this little pittance for the purpose of educating their children, we are told that the pendulum is swinging to an extreme, and we had better be careful. The grangers are at work in the Northwest, and I suppose it is on that ground we are to account for the sudden conversion of my friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.] I presume the grangers want all that remains of the public lands to sow their grass in order to furnish hay-seed to that gentleman and others to put in their hair. [Laughter.] I trust this bill will pass, as it did in the last Congress. If anybody has scruples, let him give the benefit of that doubt to the poor children of the country. Minnesota, which has the best school fund now in the Union, and Iowa, which has $3,000,000 of an educational fund, which are matters of boast by their Representatives upon this floor, will not object, I hope, to giving the older States, from whom they derived this public domain, the small pittance here provided from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for educational purposes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I give notice I will offer the following amendment, if I get an opportunity to do so:

Insert after section 6 the following: In each State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, the sum of 10 per cent. of the amount which may be apportioned under the provisions of this act may, at the discretion of the Legislature thereof, be annually applied to the use and support of at least one university.

Mr. DUNNELL. I give notice that I will propose the following amendment:

Insert in line 7 the following words: On the entry of public lands, under the act entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on the prairies," approved March 3, 1873.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I give notice, if I get an opportunity, I will move a substitute to the bill; which I ask to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BURCHARD. I give notice I will move the following substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof: That the net proceeds arising from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of the public lands of the United States are hereby set apart and annually appropriated for the maintenance of common schools for the free education of all the children in the United States of suitable school age, which proceeds shall be distributed to each State and Territory, and to the District of Columbia, in proportion to its respective population as ascertained by the census last preceding such distribution: Provided, That this act shall not have any effect to repeal, impair, or suspend any law now authorizing the pre-emption of public lands or the entry of public lands for homesteads; nor as limiting in any manner the power of Congress to alter or extend the right of homestead upon such lands: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be held to limit or abridge the power of Congress over the public domain, or interfere with granting bounty lands to the soldiers and sailors of our late war.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause an account to be taken after the close of each fiscal year, and ascertain the amount of expenditures during the last preceding fiscal year incurred in, or occasioned by, the survey, sale, location, entry, or other disposition of the public lands of the United States, including appropriations for the expenses of the general and district land-offices during such year, and the total receipts from the sale or other disposition of such lands, including all fees received at such offices, and shall, on or before the 1st day of December of each year, certify to the Secretary of the Interior the amount of the net cash proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of such lands after deducting such expenses and expenditures.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of such certificate the Commissioner of Education, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall proceed to apportion, upon the basis of population, the amount so certified to the District of Columbia and Territories of the United States, and to each State wherein provision is made by law for the free education of all the children thereof between the ages of six and fifteen years, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States such apportionment, and to the superintendent of public instruction of each State and Territory, or other officer empowered by the laws of such State or Territory to perform the duty herein enjoined, the amount so apportioned to such State or Territory.

SEC. 4. That the superintendent of public instruction of each State and Territory, or such other officer as shall by the laws of such State or Territory be required so to do, shall immediately, upon the receipt of such certificate, proceed to apportion the amount so certified to his State or Territory to the several districts therein which shall have maintained for at least six months during the preceding year a free school for all the children of such district between the ages of six and fifteen years, which apportionment shall be upon the basis of the population of such district, and the amount so apportioned shall be solely applied in payment of teachers' wages. The said superintendent or officer shall report his apportionment so made to the Commissioner of Education, who thereupon, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall certify the same, or so much thereof as appears regular and correct, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to such superintendent or other officer designated as aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That the amount apportioned to the school districts of any State, and certified as herein provided, shall be paid upon the warrant of the Commissioner of Education, countersigned by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of the Treasury of the United States, to the State or territorial treasury, or to such officer as shall be designated by the laws of such State or Territory to receive, account for, and pay over the same to the several districts entitled thereto under such apportionment, which treasurer or officer shall be required to report, on or before the 1st day of October of each year, to the Commissioner of Education, a detailed statement of the payments made and balance in his hands withheld, unclaimed, or for any cause unpaid.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioner of Education shall be ex officio superintendent of public instruction for the District of Columbia, and as such shall make the appointment, returns, report, and certificates for said District of Columbia in the manner and for the purposes and under the limitations prescribed in section 4 of this act, and the money thus apportioned in said District shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States to the proper officers entitled to receive, use, account for, or pay over the same, as may be provided by law.

That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to affect in any manner the existing laws and regulations in regard to the adjustment and payment to States upon their admission into the Union of 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits.

Mr. COX. When in order, I shall propose an amendment to strike out the eleventh and twelfth sections of the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries; who also announced that the President had signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 418) to authorize the First National Bank of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, to change its location and name;

An act (H. R. No. 614) to so amend the laws relative to internal revenue as to allow distillery warehouses to be continued in use after changes have occurred in the management of the business; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 16) providing for a change in the name and title of the agent and consul-general of the United States at Alexandria.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. E. H. ROBERTS in the chair,) for the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service. Unless objection is made the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and it will now be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to dispensing with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. As there has been a desire intimated by several gentlemen to debate this bill, I do not propose at present to ask to have the bill read for amendment, but I propose to leave the matter open for general debate until such time as the Committee of the Whole is willing to proceed to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs for amendment. In order to the general debate proceeding I suppose there is no necessity for the bill being read at all at present; but when the time comes for amendments, if any gentleman insists, of course the bill will then have to be read, first in full and afterward in detail.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the debate proceeding now, but shall object when the proper time comes to dispensing with the first reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Perhaps, then, it may be as well to have the first reading now.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine whether or not it is the fact that neither the report of the Secretary of the Navy, nor the reports of any of the heads of Bureaus making their estimates for appropriations, have yet been printed?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I said the other day, in reply to a like question, that I could not answer as to the stage of the progress of the printing of these reports; so far as I am myself concerned I have seen them all. But I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that, as bearing upon the principal feature of this bill, that is, its large reduction of the estimates, the reports of the Bureau officers, or of the Secretary, give very little light; because the appropriations have in almost every case been largely reduced from the estimates of the Bureaus.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Not if it is to occupy the time to which I may be entitled.

Mr. BECK. I do not wish to take any time. I wish to say to the House that, after making the statement I did the evening before last, that I did not want delay but wanted information, I went to the Navy Department yesterday morning, and saw the chief clerk. I desired to be able to look over the reports of the different Bureaus, to see why the items in this bill were put as they are. I wanted, in other words, to understand it; and I was advised that none of the reports had yet been printed—that is, they were still in the printer's hands and not ready for distribution.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. BECK. Therefore I have been unable to see any of them. I suppose no member of this House, except, perhaps, one or two members of the Committee on Appropriations, has seen any of them. Therefore we are groping in the dark—at least I am. And although I have no doubt, from the aggregate of the bill, that the committee have been as economical as they can be, I do not see how any of us can vote intelligently on the bill, unless we assume that the Committee on Appropriations knows all about it, and that we will just do as they tell us.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me say on this point—because there may be the same difficulty in the minds of other gentlemen—that while I am desirous that the House should be kept at work upon the appropriation bills as steadily as possible—and in that I represent the feeling of the committee—yet, so far as this bill is concerned, while I shall push it as fast as the sentiment of the House inclines that it shall be pushed, I do not propose to drive it through, or attempt to drive it through, with any unseemly haste so as to prevent gentlemen from having full opportunity to consult the documents now in the printer's hands, which I presume will soon be here.

Mr. Chairman, in submitting this appropriation bill to the House of Representatives—reducing expenditures in a single Department, as it does, nearly $3,000,000—I have deemed it advisable to enter somewhat at length into the considerations that influenced the committee in making these reductions.

The American Navy, Mr. Chairman, has had a checkered history. In the Revolution it bore no very leading part; but the exploits of its enterprising captains, almost always performed in single-handed combat against a superior power, showed to the world that no decks were better manned or better fought than ours, and taught the American people the first lesson of pride in their Navy. During the period of confederation the service languished, as all others did. In the twelve first years of our present system, when under Washington and Adams, to a large degree the British fashion as to establishments, civil or military, was followed, the foundation was laid for a respectable navy. The tide turned under Jefferson, who, if he could have had his way, would probably have reduced every department of the Government to a bare and almost pastoral simplicity, and all idea of a large naval establishment was abandoned, wooden gun-boats for harbor defense being substituted. The war of 1812 changed things again, and the brilliant naval triumphs of Porter and Perry and McDonough and Decatur and other naval commanders floated the American Navy to the topmost wave of popularity, all the more because those triumphs were contrasted with mortifying and continued defeats on land. It then became certain that for all time, or for a long time in the history of the Government, a respectable naval establishment would be made a part of our Government service.

For fifty years all administrations have assented to this, and liberal appropriations have, from time to time, been made for the Navy, generally increasing from year to year; and, if gentlemen care to look into this matter during the time from the war of 1812 up to 1860, they will find that then, as during the late war, much of the money that was appropriated was injudiciously expended, and that many of the vessels built were a bad investment. The immense line-of-battle ships, to be named after the different States of the Union, and to carry from 75 to 120 guns each, sunk an enormous sum of money, and many of them were almost entirely valueless in adding anything to the strength of the Navy. They were of no more account, or of little more account, than if the money put into them had been sunk into the water which they were built to float upon. But notwithstanding this, many good ships were built during this period, noticeably the Wabash, the Franklin, the Colorado, the Minnesota, and others of a like kind built in the decade between 1860 and 1870; so that when, in 1861, the war broke upon us, there were some vessels in the American Navy which I venture to say were the finest afloat upon all the seas.

At this time the annual appropriations for the Navy had reached over $15,000,000. I beg gentlemen to bear this in mind when I come to discuss the main feature of this, namely, its reduction.

The war of 1861 launched us on a vast sea of expenditure; it is a period with which no fair comparison can be made as to the expenditure of public money, either on the land or on the sea. The salvation of the Republic was at issue. To insure this Congress made large appropriations for the Navy and for the Army, and the loyal people sustained them.

It is this feature in our naval history that has always dwelt in the minds of such gentlemen here as are represented by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who has always found a difficulty in reconciling the need of any great appropriations to-day with the fact that so much money was expended during the war. The gentleman should remember that money went but a little way and in many directions during the war. Everything needed to be created at that time. We had a coast of two thousand miles to blockade; we had to chase from the sea the cruisers of the confederacy, built and equipped in England—the Alabama, the Shenandoah, the Georgia, and others. New ships must be built for this need. We had to fit out immense military and naval expeditions to capture important points on the coast. There is hardly anything that is so great an absorbent of the public treasure as these expeditions. Let any gentleman read the military history of Great Britain and he will find that every one of her military and naval expeditions was followed by a depletion of the treasury, and an increase of taxation.

More than all this, causing more expenditure, and to a degree furnishing an excuse for the Navy Department at that day, was the fact that there came in a new era in naval architecture. When the iron-clad Merrimac came out of Norfolk Harbor she crushed our best vessels like egg-shells, and frightened our people very much as the monsters of fable and mythology frightened whole nations. Had it not been for the little Monitor which met the Merrimac and drove her back we should have been entirely and hopelessly helpless.

Of course new plans and schemes of naval construction came in, new monitors had to be built, iron-clad vessels were started in all the yards of the North. It was new ground. Experiment after experiment had to be resorted to during this time, and they were all expensive. But in one way and another all these difficulties were met; the coast was blockaded; it became an enterprise of life and death for a blockade-runner to attempt to go in or to come out of one of the southern ports; every hostile sea-board town was captured; the rebel cruisers were chased off the sea; an immense iron-clad navy was built up, such as it was, and hundreds of wooden vessels stood on the rolls of the Navy, either built or bought by the Government in its day of peril. The list in 1865 exceeded six hundred in number. What kind of vessels were they when the immediate emergency which had called them into use had passed? That is the point for my friend from Kentucky to consider when he is tracing our present small Navy back to the day when the war ended. That is nine years ago, and good vessels will go in that time. How much have we really got out of that war-navy for our moderate peace establishment since? That question bears upon the discussion of this bill.

I cannot enter into the details to show why nearly all this great force faded away.

During the time of the war every dollar was spent for the immediate emergency; there was no thought of the future. I recall one class of vessels, twenty in number, laid and built, not one of which could ever float. I always believed there was fault in the Navy Department in its war management; but that is a question that we have not to deal with now. The light-draught monitors, that would drop like a leaden plummet to the bottom of the sea the moment they were set afloat, must be charged to profit and loss. And so with wooden vessels. Scores of them were built of green timber, and capable of being kept afloat only a few years. And when a ship was once launched and it was found she would swim, she was run without repairs as long as she would stay above water.

A simile that I have before used in this connection occurs to me. The American Navy in the war was run like a race-horse. It had to win the race, no matter what the strain to muscle and sinew. And so the result was, that when we came out of the war the very best vessels that we had were the old ships, that had been built before the war and that had come through it—the ships that had been carefully built in peace, of seasoned timber, with ample time bestowed upon their construction.

From year to year appropriations were lessened, and all that remained for the administration of the Navy Department was to take these shabby, rotten, war-built vessels and the few ships of older construction and to make the most of them, to keep them in repair from year to year, so that we could have a respectable Navy afloat on the seas of the globe. And that is what has been done in the years since the war.

While these appropriations have been continually lessened, I wish gentlemen to bear one thing in mind, and that is, that the present Secretary of the Navy, to his credit be it said, has always cut his garment according to the cloth which Congress has given him. He has not exceeded the appropriations in his expenses. He will not the next year if peace holds. Whatever his limitation, he runs his Department of the Government upon the theory that with Congress rests the responsibility as to the amount of money to be given to maintain the naval establishment.

This brings us down to the year 1873.

In November there came up, as all gentlemen know, the troubles with the Spanish authorities upon the case of the Virginius. Public feeling was greatly aroused and excited. I remember that—perhaps in the district of my friend from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] who proposes to speak on this bill, whether in opposition or not I do not know—an immense meeting was holden to urge and inflame the Administration to war measures. Whether or not the whole country wanted war I will not here discuss. I do not believe it did. But the public sentiment did demand firmness on the part of the Government. If Spain, or the Spanish officer commanding their ship, had been guilty of a violation of international law as we had always maintained it to be, it was our bounden duty to make demand for satisfaction. And, Mr. Chairman, upon the Navy Department was put the burden of showing that, when we made a demand, we were in a condition to enforce it. There was no other Department of the Government that was so directly involved in the result had war instead of peace come upon us. I cannot here express all my gratitude to the President and the Secretary of State for the skillful manner in which the whole matter was managed, but had they been unable to settle the question by diplomacy, the result must have fallen directly upon our Navy.

The Secretary of the Navy acted with vigor, and, as I believe, with wisdom. He called home from the Atlantic squadrons every ship. He brought up to the North from the southern seas vessels that were almost sinking and needed repair and outfit, and put them in course of repair. He took from the docks and the yards the iron-clads, and set to work upon them skilled mechanics, in order to put them in fighting condition. The work was of course done hurriedly, but I believe it was done wisely and well. And the result was, that had war struck us he would have had in Cuban waters by the 15th of this month a force of four hundred guns, as large as, if not a little larger than, the Spanish fleet in those waters.

Now, sir, all this cost money, and when Congress reassembled it appreciated that fact and voted money liberally. It gave in the first naval appropriation bill $4,000,000 to cover the extraordinary emergency and to reimburse the Bureaus of the Department that had had their usual funds swallowed up by the necessity forced upon us. I ask gentlemen to bear this in mind, that this money was not used as a part of the regular naval expenditures, and would never have been called for had the usual state of things existed.

This brings me directly to the bill in question—the regular naval appropriation bill for the next year—the first of the appropriation bills that has come before the House for consideration; the Army bill having been first reported, but delayed by no fault of the gentleman having it in charge, but for other reasons. We are brought then directly to this bill and to its leading feature, the reduction of expenditures. In considering this bill, as well as others, the Committee on Appropriations found themselves confronted with a stern duty. Upon that committee, more than any other representing this House, was the responsibility of initiating the policy of retrenchment in governmental expenses. There was no shirking, and I may truthfully say that there was no disposition of the part or the committee to shirk this duty.

The close of the year found us in no prosperous condition so far as revenue and expenditures were concerned. A great financial panic had set in and had run desperately for weeks. The revenues of the Government had fallen off, and yet the wheels of its machinery must be kept in motion. A deficiency stared us in the face. We were in the condition of spending more money than we were at the time receiving as revenue. We had presented to us three alternatives—new taxation, which is always offensive; a loan, (which means borrowing money to pay our bills;) or the cutting down of expenditures so that in the next year the Government would be run on a basis within its current revenues. The Committee on Appropriations believe—I believe, sir—that for the year commencing July 1 next, enough of reduction can be made in the expenses of the Government, so that with the improved revenues expected from our present system of taxation the next year will show no falling behind.

The committee has not felt itself above the task of cutting down these expenditures. The committee has not believed this to be a "cheese-paring" operation, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] called it, or, as some of the papers have put it, "a petty business." The committee has found itself confronted with what it believes to be indisputable facts—that there is in many, in almost all, of the Departments of the Government, superfluous force; that there is opportunity and occasion for restriction in this line; that too much money has been spent in the way of decoration and adornment in public buildings, in fortifications, in river and harbor improvements, and in all the civil and military departments of the Government.

And no better day to cut down can come than the present. In setting about this work, the committee do it in no spirit of hostility to the Departments. The gentlemen at their heads are not, nor is the present Administration, accountable for the existing condition. The swollen condition of our civil establishments has not come during the tenure of these gentlemen in office.

These enormous expenditures in the personnel and in the running of the Departments grew up during the war, and in the immense labors thrown upon each Department immediately thereafter. To-day, almost for the first time, Congress is confronted with the duty of reduction.

Let us look at the Navy Department. The annual naval appropriation for the last year amounted to $22,000,957.65. This amount (and it is fair that the statement should be made in making the estimate as to the reduction proposed by this bill) included $3,000,000 voted for the construction of eight new sloops-of-war. Making this deduction, the regular appropriation for the Navy for last year was $19,000,957.65. The reduction in this bill upon that amount is $2,602,939; making the aggregate appropriation in the bill in round numbers, $16,500,000. It is a little more, but I have not in my eye the exact figures.

Mr. Chairman, the committee in making up this bill has planted itself on this position: wherever any part of the $4,000,000 appropriated in December last enters into the improvement of the regular cruising Navy which we are to keep up in time of peace, corresponding deduction has been made in the appropriations for the coming year. Wherever stores derived from that appropriation have accumulated in any of the Bureaus that can be used in the ordinary naval service, such amounts have been deducted. Wherever enterprises that have been begun can be dispensed with, they have been cut off. Wherever there has been found too large civil force in the Department, in its navy-yards, the committee has put the knife to these establishments and has cut them down. I give some of the details as to different Bureaus. Here are the figures for the present and next year, showing the reductions in the different Bureaus:

Bureau, &c.	1873-'74.	1874-'75.	Reduction.
Pay	$6,250,000	$6,250,000
Contingent	100,000	100,000
Navigation	325,900	199,350	$126,550
Ordnance	633,516	455,000	178,516
Equipment and Recruiting	1,500,000	1,100,000	400,000
Contingent	125,000	75,000	50,000
Yards and Docks	900,000	800,000	100,000
Naval Asylum	58,478	53,273	5,205
Medicine and Surgery	90,000	60,000	30,000
Provisions and Clothing	1,592,600	1,330,000	262,000
Contingent	75,000	50,000	25,000
Construction and Repair	3,500,000	3,300,000	200,000
Steam Engineering	2,300,000	1,500,000	800,000
Naval Academy			34,000
Marine Corps	1,145,267	877,606	267,670
			2,474,832
Civil establishment	255,000	153,000	102,000
Hospitals	65,268	99,161	26,107
			2,602,939

The Pay Department is a matter fixed by law; that, of course, has not been interfered with. All these are reductions in the running expenses of the Department, inclusive.

So that, Mr. Chairman, this bill, (and I beg the attention of gentlemen who may be inclined to criticise it as being yet too large,) with all the advanced cost of labor and material, as compared with the period before the war, makes an aggregate appropriation only about a million dollars larger than the naval appropriations for 1859. Now, in candor and fairness, I ask gentlemen who are anxious for economy, I ask the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who has always given intelligent criticism and scrutiny to naval bills, whether he really expected the Committee on Appropriations would cut down the naval appropriation bill to a figure so near the expenses of the Navy for 1859? If, on examination, he is satisfied that the committee has done this, then I trust that, in the progress of this bill, he and I shall be found working side by side; for, having been a member of a Committee on Appropriations that attempted faithfully to reduce expenditures, he knows how much difference there is between a reduction proposed by a responsible committee on fair examination, and a reduction that may be attempted by a motion from the floor, not backed up by complete and judicious investigation. That is what the committee has given in the case.

A gentleman at my right, Mr. Chairman, asks what guarantee we have that all this will not come back as a deficiency.

That guarantee, I tell him, I have already stated to the House—that the Secretary of the Navy will make his garment according to the cloth we give him, as he has thus far always done.

And let me say here—for it is pertinent, and I am glad the gentleman has asked the question—that almost all of this reduction is made with the assent of the Secretary of the Navy. It is fair to him to say that he does not believe that the committee of the House, in cutting down expenditures, is engaged in a "petty business." He has contributed to forward the efforts of the committee in this direction, and I am glad to say it for him, and know my associates on the committee will bear me out.

Now there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, to which I wish to call the special attention of the committee, and that is, the civil establishment of the Navy Department, because it is here that the committee has first put in the knife in cutting down superfluous departmental force. It is but the beginning of the long road that the committee has to travel. Previous to the war, sir, the navy-yards were run with but few Bureaus and with but a small force, but by the act of 1862, in the second year of the war, the Navy Department was subdivided into eight Bureaus. Each Bureau had a head; each head had under him a corps of clerks, which were undoubtedly needed in the immensely increased labor of the Department. But after awhile, sir, it came about that this system of having every Bureau represented as it was at the head of the Department extended to every yard. And this not only continued in the immediate years after the war, when there was much labor to be performed, but down to the present day. And it is a fact, and it may be new to some gentlemen here, that in every yard in the country, from Kittery to Mare Island, California, every Bureau is represented by a corps of clerks. They are called by all sorts of names. If gentlemen will turn to the estimates for naval appropriations under the different Bureaus they will find "time-keepers," "gate-keepers," "bill-head clerks," and "draughtsmen," and, indeed, almost every imaginable name that could be applied to any duty.

Now, the committee has done this, and the result is found in the second clause of the bill before us. The committee do not deem it advisable to go into the list of clerks to see what one should be cut off and what one left, for that might result in turning out a good man and keeping in a poor man. But in preparing this bill I carefully aggregated the appropriations for the civil establishment in each yard. I found at the Kittery yard that thirty thousand dollars and odd were paid for twenty-five clerks; I found at Charlestown were paid thirty-eight thousand dollars and odd for twenty-seven clerks; at the Brooklyn yard thirty-nine thousand dollars and odd for twenty-nine clerks; at Philadelphia thirty-five thousand dollars and over for twenty-five clerks; at Norfolk thirty thousand dollars and over for twenty-four clerks; at Washington thirty-one thousand dollars and over for twenty-three clerks; and at Mare Island thirty-three thousand dollars and over for twenty-one clerks. The Committee on Appropriations believed here was a good place to cut down. Some of us knew, having seen for ourselves, that this force was too large. What should be done? We deemed it better to cut down the force than to keep all and reduce individual salaries. We did this—and I want the attention of gentlemen to it, because it is significant, not simply for the amount saved, but as a step in the path the committee mean to take. We took the appropriations for every yard and reduced them 40 per cent., giving only 60 per cent. of the appropriations which have gone on for years for this work. It is fair here to say that last year there were some smaller reductions made in advance of this in some of the Bureaus, so that the reduction last year and this amounts to nearly one-half of the civil establishment; and that is the way it stands in this bill.

With the hospitals I did the same. I found that the expenditures for the civil force were $65,268, and I cut them down 40 per cent., leaving it at 60 per cent. for the whole force.

Now the committee believe, on some examination, that these Bureaus and these yards can be run with this money, and perhaps, sir, for less; but of this I do not feel sure. But I feel that the committee, which has before it the real, sober task of effectual reduction, will not imperil its bills by attempting so rank a reduction that there shall be a revolt of sentiment in either branch of Congress or in the country, and so what is a real intent shall have its "current turned awry and lose the name of action." The committee want these bills, which are to reduce expenditures, not merely to be reported with a parade of trumpets, but that they go through, and that no excuse be given to gentlemen whose navy-yards are affected to make a fight against them; and so the committee fell upon 40 per cent. as being the reduction here which it would recommend to Congress. So much for the civil establishment.

Gentlemen will see that in all the Bureaus, with the exception of one, the reduction has been large, large enough I think to satisfy any reasonable man. The exception to which I allude is that in the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Now, Mr. Chairman, this Bureau is the one which goes to the general maintenance of the Navy, in keeping it afloat. The repairs upon the vessels, all that goes into them—with the exception of what belongs to the Steam-Engineering Bureau—all draw upon its fund. The Secretary, when he came before the committee, said to us, "Gentlemen, whenever you find a superfluous officer, cut him off; whenever you find stores provided in excess, cut down the appropriation; whenever you find the Navy run on too vast a scale, cut that out; but if you leave anything comparatively untouched, let it be in the Bureau of Construction and Repair, for it is to that Bureau that I look in maintaining the Navy as it is upon the water. The committee, sir, respected that argument. It is an argument which should have force here. It is an argument which will have force in the country. I have no doubt, in selecting the places for cutting off, that the committee has done wisely in cutting off from other Bureaus and leaving this one as it is.

Now, sir, some gentleman, perhaps, will ask me if we could not cut down more because of the $4,000,000 already given to the Navy Department. My answer to that is this: what we are appropriating now, Mr. Chairman, is not for a Navy that we believe will be hurried at a day's notice into war—because if that were so we should ask for more money—it is simply for the maintenance of a prudently regulated naval establishment on the seas of the globe. The money that we gave in the four-million bill almost all of it went into the fitting out of vessels which, if we had had trouble with Spain, would have felt the first shock of the conflict, but when it was over must be again laid up in the docks and navy-yards for a future warlike purpose. It went upon such large vessels as the Minnesota and the Franklin, the Florida and Colorado, vessels too large to be kept afloat in a time of peace, but terrible in a time of war. It went upon such iron-clads and monitors as the Dictator, the Ajax, the Catskill, the Nahant, and others. It put them into proper condition for fighting the enemy, but not a dollar upon this class of vessels was of the least good to the Navy itself that we are keeping afloat, and which our history shows that we need to keep afloat, in time of peace.

I have here, sir, a list of the money expended in this Bureau of Construction and Repair upon the kind of vessels I speak of that do not count in the regular Navy; and it amounts, Mr. Chairman, to $2,370,000; and all that we gave in the emergency bill to this Bureau was $2,000,000. Is there any gentleman here so ingenious that he can draw from that any argument that the Bureau of Construction and Repair should be cut down because it has already been helped by the contributions derived from the emergency bill? To the Bureau of Ordnance the same applies, but not in so great a degree. Into the supplies and munitions that were appropriated for these large vessels and iron-clads and monitors, nearly $350,000 of the emergency appropriation entered, and we cut down the Bureau of Ordnance last year $178,000. In the Bureau of Engineering we have cut down $800,000 from last year. These three Bureaus cover a large portion of the expenditures in the Navy that are not fixed by law, like pay, and provisions and clothing.

The money given in December was not misplaced. These vessels were put in a condition by which, if war should again loom upon us, they could at twenty days' notice be put to sea and meet the foe at home or abroad. That tells the story as to the $4,000,000 given for the emergency bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have gone over at more length than I intended the details of this bill. I could amplify and enlarge more, but that seems to me not necessary. The reduction is, I venture to say, as great or greater than any gentleman who has given this subject fair examination expected us to make. It is, as I have said, almost as low as the appropriations were before the war. Were it not that Congress has already authorized one year ago eight new sloops-of-war to be built, and that five or six others have been made as good as new in the last three years, we could not have made this bill so small as it is. I may truthfully say to gentlemen that it is a bill that has been prepared faithfully by the committee, with much consideration, and represents the faithful and sincere desire of that committee to cut down appropriations.

Sir, it is no easy task. In this matter of the civil establishment, where we have taken off 40 per cent., it was not a comfortable thing to do. There are men to-day living under the old extravagant system, in the navy-yards as elsewhere, with wives and families, who are pinched to maintain themselves. Some of them must go out; God only knows where they will go to. All these things involve serious consideration. But notwithstanding that, the committee did consider that upon them was put the sober duty of cutting down this establishment to the point where they believed it could be run in accordance with the best interests of the Government.

There are gentlemen here whose localities will be affected; there is no doubt of that. There is no man who has a navy-yard in his own district with good friends filling the places that will not be tempted to consider this question in a narrow view, and to struggle to keep up these establishments. But there is a higher duty before the House of Representatives and Congress than that, and I ask the House upon this and upon all other parts of the bill to sustain the Committee on Appropriations in reducing these expenditures. Hardship will of course come of it; but the money of the people should be only taken, the committee believe, to the extent that is imperatively necessary to insure a good, fair, working administration of the Government. To that work sir, the Committee on Appropriations is dedicated for this Congress, as I hope it will be for all future Congresses.

Mr. ARCHER. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make a speech now upon this bill, and I would not have asked the floor even for ten minutes but for the fact that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has several times alluded to the difficulty I seemed to have in understanding naval appropriation bills, and appeared to indicate that I had been making objection to very many things to which there was no valid objection.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman will allow me to say that he misunderstood me entirely. What I intended to say was, that the gentleman had been on the Committee on Appropriations, and that he knew how easy it is to make objections, but that his objections, I thought, were actuated by a real desire to cut down expenditures. I do think so. I give him that credit.

Mr. BECK. In the noise and confusion in this House it is extremely difficult to hear what is said, and therefore I misunderstood the gentleman. I propose, before the general debate is over, to lay before the House, if opportunity is allowed me, the reasons why I have from time to time objected to these appropriations.

I rise now merely for the purpose of saying that the only reason why I objected to the consideration of this bill now was because I want information upon which to act. I do not believe that the appropriations for the Navy can be held at the amount now fixed by the committee. Sixteen million dollars and a fraction is all they propose to allow, while for every year, from 1868 to the present time, we have been compelled to appropriate a much larger amount for this purpose. In 1868 the appropriations amounted to $25,700,000; in 1869 to $20,000,000; in 1870 to $21,780,000; in 1871 to $19,431,000; in 1872 to $21,449,000; and in 1873 to $23,525,000, and I am not one of those who believe that we can bring down the appropriations for the Navy to $16,000,000 during the year 1874, however much we may desire to do so.

One other word. We have, as I have shown, appropriated over $20,000,000 every year. I have seen low appropriation bills presented before. I believe the dominant party in this House have never failed to make their appropriations very low at the session immediately preceding a general election, but they have never failed to bring them up after the election was over. My information is that deficiencies amounting to about $28,000,000 were passed after the first election of the present President in 1868, and of over $15,000,000 after they had bridged over the last election.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman speaks of the "dominant party." Does he apply the remark generally to whichever party is dominant here?

Mr. BECK. Sir, the party to which the gentleman belongs has been very dominant here ever since I have been in Congress. I am not sure that my own party would not do the same thing, but we have never had a chance. I hope we shall have one soon. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I meant to ask the gentleman one question, and I think I know what his answer will be. He says he does not think these low figures can be stuck to and followed out. Now, will he not join with the Committee on Appropriations during this session and hereafter in trying to keep the appropriations down to this figure?

Mr. BECK. I will say this: After I see the estimates of the Bureaus and am satisfied that the Committee on Appropriations have cut them down to a point where they can be maintained I surely will sustain the committee; but if upon examination of the estimates it is clear to my mind that the reduction will have to be met by a deficiency next fall, then I will not agree in advance to vote with the committee.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Nor would I recommend you to do so under such circumstances.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. If I understood the gentleman from Kentucky aright, he stated that the deficiencies the first year after the election of the present Chief Magistrate amounted to $28,000,000?

Mr. BECK. That is my information.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman speak from figures?

Mr. BECK. I speak from information furnished me by a gentleman who was himself at that time a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and who tells me that that is his recollection.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does the gentleman mean the deficiency that came over from the last year of Andrew Johnson's administration, or of the first year of General Grant's administration?

Mr. BECK. From the last year of Andrew Johnson's administration.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BECK. The republican party, wanting to appear to be very economical before the election, made the appropriations low, so that they could go before the people and claim to have been economical, and when the election was over they made up the amount by deficiency bills.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to what he said in regard to the first year of President Grant's administration. I ask him if he thinks that Administration was responsible for deficiencies which came over from the last Administration?

Mr. BECK. Let me answer. The gentleman was here, and his party had then a two-thirds majority in this House, just as it has to-day.

Mr. DAWES. Deficiencies do not come from legislation, but from administration. Now I want to inquire of my friend——

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] extend my time?

Mr. ARCHER. I cannot.

Mr. DAWES. One question. I understood the gentleman to say that the deficiencies in the following year were $20,000,000.

Mr. BECK. No; I said that two years ago, according to my recollection, the appropriations were comparatively small prior to the general election, and then when the election was over the deficiencies were very large. Not expecting to take part in this debate, I have not looked up the exact figures, but have only given them as furnished me by a friend who was a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. I think the gentleman is substantially correct as to the first deficiencies; but as to the second deficiencies, when the gentleman himself was on the Committee on Appropriations, according to my recollection, there was none that exceeded seven millions.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman will allow me I will look up the figures and correct myself; I have no time to do so now.

Mr. DAWES. I do not speak from authority; I only speak from memory.

Mr. BECK. So do I. What I want to say is this: I am in favor of all legitimate reduction of expenditures. I am in favor, so far as I can, when I have the information, to stand by the committee in all they do in that direction. But the objections I have for the last few years persisted in making are, that for the last six years we have been expending over $20,000,000 a year; yet our Navy has been constantly running down and getting more and more inefficient. I have never complained, as I might have done, of the war expenditures. I showed by the reports of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, furnished during the last Congress upon a resolution of mine calling for information, that the War Department had expended over and above the appropriations we made $130,060,000, received from the sales of our property. I showed that at the close of the war we had six hundred and odd ships, and that now we have but one hundred and thirty or forty, and that large amounts of other property had been sold and expended. I showed also, and General Morgan, of Ohio, did so still more fully, that about $3,800,000 had been given for extra compensation to officers of the Navy without authority of law. These were the things of which I complained, and as to which I demanded information before I would vote for large additional appropriations for these Departments.

But as I have no time, I must waive all that until another opportunity. I want to say explicitly, since I am on the floor, that my object is to cut down the appropriations as low as possible, because the state of the Treasury absolutely requires it. The Secretary of the Treasury is now calling upon us for at least $40,000,000 more than the present revenue, to be raised of course by additional taxation. I will by every possible means resist additional taxation; I will resist any increase of the public debt by every means in my power. And as means must be furnished to meet all demands upon us, I will endeavor by reducing expenditures to sustain the Government in all legitimate demands without any additional taxation or increase of debt, and I am satisfied that can be done.

The pressure upon the Treasury has been and is so great that the Secretary has felt compelled to increase the debt by issuing a large portion of what he calls the reserve of $44,000,000. He is doing this, in my opinion, in clear violation of law. I say "in clear violation of law" because by the act of April 12, 1866, (chapter 39,) it was provided—

That of United States notes not more than $10,000,000 may be retired and canceled within six months from the passage of this act, and thereafter not more than $4,000,000 in any one month.

The act of February 4, 1868, provided—

That from and after the passage of this act, the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any reduction of the currency, by retiring or canceling United States notes shall be, and is hereby, suspended.

At that date $356,000,000 were outstanding, and the Secretary assumes that he is authorized to reissue the other $44,000,000 or not, at his discretion. He has put into circulation lately over $22,000,000 of this, which he calls a reserve. It is in no sense a reserve. To be "retired and canceled" are the words of the act of 1866. When retired the Secretary's duty was to cancel, and he cannot reissue a canceled note.

I know that reserves were provided for, both by the laws of 1862 and 1864, but the object in each was clearly set forth, and the present over-issue of legal-tender notes is not covered by any law, and none of the provisions in any of the laws providing for the reissue of a like amount of circulation in consequence of the cancellation of mutilated notes cover the case.

Sir, no Secretary of the Treasury ought to have the right to contract or inflate the currency to the extent of either $44,000,000 or any other sum without direct authority of Congress. And the present Secretary of the Treasury has not that right, although he is exercising it every day.

If that can be done by the Secretary there is no use for a Congress; there is no use for us to limit by law what shall be the currency of the country if the Secretary of the Treasury can make it $44,000,000, more or less, to suit his own convenience, or meet any exigency, however urgent, as he now claims the right to do, and as he is exercising the right——

Mr. BECK. I will not ask for more time from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER.] I will make this very plain when I can get the floor in my own right.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Chairman, the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations shows a want of appreciation on the part of that committee of the condition either of the Navy or of the country. I confess that I was somewhat surprised to hear the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] advocate this bill. It is a delusion, and a gentleman knowing as well as he does the condition of the American Navy must be satisfied that the amount of $16,000,000 appropriated by this bill must necessarily cause a deficiency bill for the years 1874 and 1875 of at least $5,000,000. It is not possible that the Navy of the United States, as it now stands, can be run for any such sum of money.

The gentleman in his remarks said that in 1859 the expenditures for the Navy were $15,000,000 per year. He now proposes by his bill that the Navy Department, with all its increase of ships, with all its increase of officers, with all the increase in the expenses of mechanics, shall be run for only one million more per year. Sir, that cannot be done. I say to this House now that five millions additional would not more than meet the actual requirements of the Navy of the United States.

And then, too, the Committee on Appropriations show no appreciation of our foreign relations as they exist at this time. The difficulty that exists between this country and Spain has not yet passed by. There was a probability that the relations which existed between Spain and this country might remain peaceful when Castelar was at the head of the Spanish government, for he was known to be individually a friend of this Republic. But what was the result? This very friendship for the American people has caused his deposition, and in his place has been put Serrano, who has nothing but hatred and dislike to our country. Yet, sir, the proposition is that our Navy should stand, not upon the usual peace basis, but one-fourth below the usual peace basis.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentlemen is mistaken in that statement. The aggregate appropriation last year was but $19,000,000.

Mr. ARCHER. Nineteen million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. This bill makes a reduction upon that aggregate of only $2,600,000; and the committee believe that the amount we now propose to appropriate will run the Navy on exactly the same peace basis, for all practical purposes, as it has been run on heretofore; that there will not be any necessity for reducing the number of vessels, for reasons which I will give in reply to the gentleman.

Mr. ARCHER. But that is an impossibility, as can be demonstrated. We have now sent out to sea, fitted out, manned to the utmost capacity which the law permits, fleets that have not since the close of the war floated upon the ocean. The expense attending those vessels must continue. The fleet that we have now at Key West and in the Cuban waters must remain.

Mr. GARFIELD. How long?

Mr. ARCHER. Until all probability of difficulty with Spain shall have passed away.

Mr. GARFIELD. How long will that probably be?

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman dares not, as a member of the republican party, recommend the withdrawal of our fleet from the Cuban waters with these difficulties pending.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to remind him that when the proposition for a permanent increase of the Navy was before the House—an increase of the Navy to ten thousand men—I moved a limitation of that increase so as to make it temporary, to provide that it should be cut off by the 1st of January next at the latest date; and the Secretary of the Navy can cut it down below that at any day he pleases.

Mr. ARCHER. The Senate has struck out that provision.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the Senate refuses to pass the bill altogether, so as not to allow any increase at all.

Mr. ARCHER. But if the bill be passed, have we not that additional expense until the 1st of January next?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is allowed for in this bill. Now, does not the gentleman know that so far as concerns these increased expenditures resulting from the Virginius affair, the Secretary of the Navy has already taken measures to cut them off; that he has put out of commission certain vessels that he had intended to send to the Cuban waters, saving for other and smaller vessels the great force that would have been put upon them, while he holds those ships in readiness (they being already repaired) to go at a few day's notice, the expense meanwhile being stopped?

Mr. ARCHER. But still expense has already been incurred; and a separate appropriation has been made. Besides, these vessels must be kept in their present state of repair. I am sure that my friend from Maine, in view of the vast sea-coast of his State, would not now advise the removal of these vessels from the Cuban waters with the Spanish difficulty still pending.

Mr. Chairman, if I am correctly informed we have now afloat in the Cuban waters three or four hundred guns. Spain has an equal number. There is every day danger of a collision between these forces. Sir, there is at this day a feeling in the country that this House, controlled by the republican party, has smothered the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] declaring in favor of granting belligerent rights to these people in Cuba who have been so long struggling for their freedom. Are my friends on the republican side going to ignore this demand of the people? Are they going to ignore this cry of humanity? Do they intend by the passage of an appropriation bill such as this to invite war or to invite further butchery of our citizens? This bill means an invitation to the Spaniards to butcher with impunity any of our citizens whom they may arrest upon the high seas, although they may be covered by an American flag.

What matters it whether or not the Virginius was rightfully bearing our flag? The blood of our murdered citizens cries aloud from Spanish soil that the outrage perpetrated upon them has not been avenged. The widows in our land are to have—what? Reparation in money damages! When? Perhaps when their children become gray-haired sires, if they are paid as claimants against the Government in cases of this kind are usually paid. No, sir; this bill is a delusion. In my opinion the Committee on Appropriations cannot have had the serious recommendation of any Secretary of the Navy that any such bill should be passed.

So far as the bill proposes to reduce the civil expenses of the navy-yards, it is right. During the six years I have been here no naval appropriation bill has passed when I have not insisted upon a reduction of the civil force in the navy-yards. Three or four times a provision for twenty-nine or thirty clerks was struck out by this House at the earnest solicitation of Mr. Lynch, then a member from Maine, and myself; but the appropriation was always restored in the Senate until last year, when we did manage to strike out a provision for twenty-nine clerks. And this navy-yard here had an establishment of forty-three officers and civil employés to run, at one time, about four hundred and fifty men. They have kept up the navy-yards, until this bill came in, with a civil force in them equal to the civil force which was used during the war. I have always protested against that; and I earnestly commend the Naval Committee and the Navy Department for recommending this reduction. It is right, and it is proper, for these expenditures are unnecessary and uncalled for in every respect, and should be reduced.

The next reduction this bill makes is in furnishing and buying materials. Large reductions are made in that respect. Now, sir, the little preparation we had to make in the course of a month when threatened with a war in reference to Cuban affairs was accomplished under former appropriations in the accumulation of materials in the navy-yards which could be immediately used. By the proposed great reduction in this bill we will cease to lay up in the navy-yards that material and those supplies which will be necessary to give life and activity to the Navy when the stormy day of war approaches. In that respect there is a reduction, and there is almost the only reduction.

Another reduction is in the appropriations for ordnance. While we were in our recent difficulty we were left in the position of needing one hundred eleven-inch guns which had been ordered, and which could not have been got ready in the time of thirty days if a partial pacification had not taken place. Yet, sir, they were absolutely necessary for the efficient fighting of the Navy, to make any contest at all.

Mr. Chairman, no greater mistake, on the cry of economy, can be made than the reduction of the Navy. The true economy of this country is to keep up a fair, strong Navy, in order that war may be averted, and not be economical until war comes and then go into wild extravagance, which always follows in a state of war. The true economy of a government is to keep a strong Navy. We have the naval officers, and we should keep up our naval vessels and sustain the Navy Department.

For years past the friends of the Navy have been doing their utmost to keep its head above water, with varied success.

Now and then a liberal spasm seems to animate Congress, but the effect is only momentary; an economical reaction ensues, and the Navy sinks back to its ancient inefficiency as regards material of war, until we are finally caught napping at the critical moment when we should be prepared to defend the honor of our flag.

No civilized people know so little about a Navy and what it requires as those of the United States. It is a separate profession, only understood by those who have been educated in all its details and who comprehend its necessity for the protection of our citizens and commerce.

The recent troubles with Spain have turned public attention to the necessity of placing our Navy in a condition not only to defend our shores, but, if necessary, to carry the war into an enemy's country.

In time of peace most of those who are not personally interested in keeping up a naval establishment are clamoring for retrenchment and the cutting down of appropriations to such a figure that it would be impossible for any Secretary of the Navy to keep our squadrons up to the standard of the most inferior powers.

As soon, however, as there is a prospect of war the noisiest opponents of naval expenditures are the first to cry out, "Where is the Navy upon which the nation must depend when its flag is insulted, its ships captured upon the high seas, and its citizens butchered?"

A foreign nation may, in our naval weakness, undertake to decide what vessels have a right to carry the American flag, which she would not do if the United States were powerful enough at sea to look after their own interests, and we may fairly conclude that the United States Navy is an illusion, since it in no way represents the power of the country nor is adequate to protect our citizens.

Congress is often deluded by assertions and such decided language that it would seem as if they were spoken by authority. For instance, on the 11th of December my friend from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] stated in his speech in this House that, "at Key West and other places within eight hours' sail, there are nearly four hundred guns that can be promptly placed on the scene of action whenever necessary." Such statements lead people astray, and it is inconceivable how my friend could make them, especially a late member of the Naval Committee.

The fact is, on the 11th ultimo there were at Key West, the Worcester, of 16 guns; Saugus, 2 guns; Mahopac, 2 guns; Ossipee, 8 guns; and at Santiago de Cuba, the Juniata, 8 guns; Wyoming, 6 guns, and the Kansas, 3 guns—45 guns all told; and these had been sent there after unexampled energy in getting them ready for service. All the guns that the United States Government could concentrate in Cuban waters after withdrawing the European and Brazil squadrons would only amount to 468, and this would leave the two latter stations with only one vessel each to look after American interests.

Had the Secretary of the Navy hesitated in the course to be pursued we should have had but a corporal's guard of ships in Cuba and would have made a sorry figure; but he took the proper steps, and the officers have responded with an energy that shows of what stuff the Navy is made when emergency demands haste.

My object is to show the exact condition of the Navy, so that every member can fully understand the situation of affairs; and I hope after this that we shall not deceive ourselves with the idea that we are a great naval power, or that we possess as many ships now as we did when the rebellion ended.

Many persons are harping upon the large fleet we possessed at the close of the war. These were mostly vessels that were bought from the merchant service or improvised for use on the rivers. Some were built of green timber, a number were experiments and failed, and what were not really serviceable for naval purposes were sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury.

At this moment there remain on the list 93 wooden vessels of all kinds, including sea-going ships, receiving-ships, store-ships, hulks, school-ships, and on the stocks, of which number 40 are serviceable or capable of being made so in six months, carrying, all told, 349 guns.

These are all the available guns in steamers the Navy can command. The few sailing-vessels can only be used in the future as receiving or store ships.

We have about 8 iron-clads that could be got ready in a short time for service, carrying 18 guns of large caliber; but I will not give them in detail.

The fact that the Navy Department calls for $21,000,000 a year would lead people to suppose that we must have something to show for it in the way of ships; but none of this money is intended for the building of vessels, and only part of it is used for repairs, which enter so largely into the accounts of a naval establishment.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy for the year 1873 will show that out of $19,252,235, only $5,705,000 were required for repair of vessels and machinery, and none for increase, all the rest going for pay of officers, seamen, and marines, pay of civil establishment, Ordinance and Torpedo Corps, coal and equipments, navigation supplies, hydrographic work, Naval Observatory, provisions, repairs of hospitals and laboratories, surgeons' necessaries, contingent expenses of various Departments and Bureaus, Naval Academy, support of Marine Corps, Naval Asylum, maintenance of navy-yards and docks.

Twelve years ago, previous to the late war, the estimates were not so large; but it must be remembered the entire expenses of the Government were very much less at that time and the prices of labor and material have nearly doubled. A portion of the increase of expenses is due to the fact that members of Congress living in districts which contain navy-yards get a greater number of men employed than is required, and these are not always skilled workmen.

Any one taking the register for 1873 as a guide would suppose we possess a respectable Navy even for this great country. But the register fails to state the number of vessels fit for war purposes and how many are worthless.

There are means of ascertaining all these matters, however, and what I have here stated can be relied on.

An exposition of the facts will, I trust, tend to dispel the illusion that has so long prevented our Navy from taking the stand to which it is entitled among the navies of the world.

When the war of the rebellion ended our best ships had gone through a terrible ordeal, and all that were not required to be sold were laid up for repairs. Battle and hard usage had rendered them unfit for service, and many had to be almost entirely rebuilt. This was a slow task to accomplish out of appropriations which, as I have before stated, were made for specific purposes, and in which only small sums were allowed for construction and repairs.

Time after time the condition of the Navy has been brought to the attention of Congress by the Department, and the wants of the service plainly stated; but with the exception of eight sloops-of-war authorized to be built at the last session, two of which were of iron and of little value as war-vessels, no steps have been taken to save the Navy from the scrap-heap.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not the gentleman know that during the last three years the Secretary of the Navy has been able, out of the fund given him by Congress, to repair five or six vessels to that extent that they are to-day almost the same as new vessels; and that with the new vessels which were authorized to be built last Congress they will add thirteen new vessels, at least practically new vessels, to the Navy; and, being new, will not require so much repair as old vessels, and that therefore he can afford to cut down?

Mr. ARCHER. I believe such is the fact, except in reference to cutting down; because others have been rotting while you have been cutting down.

Mr. BECK. Let me ask my friend from Maryland whether, since the settlement of our difficulty with Spain in the Virginius matter, the Committee on Naval Affairs could not unite in recommending to the Senate the return of the bill sent to them by us to authorize the employment of fifteen hundred additional sailors, as they are now no longer necessary?

Mr. ARCHER. The views of the Naval Committee I cannot communicate to the gentleman, because the matter has never been discussed. It was not offered from our committee. Whether or not I should advise the withdrawal of that bill from the Senate depends very much upon whether or not this House intends to acknowledge the belligerent rights of struggling Cuba; or whether or not this House intends to allow her citizens, when taken under our flag, to be offered up without trial, in contravention of solemn treaty, not as martyrs, but to be butchered by a foreign people. And as the gentleman has propounded a question to me, I ask him whether or not he is in favor of acknowledging the belligerent rights of the Cuban people?

Mr. BECK. I would like to see Cuba free, but I would not violate any treaty in order to obtain that result; but I would, if I were on the Naval Committee, insist on that bill being returned to us after the developments which have been made, because fifteen hundred additional men are no longer needed for the Navy; and I hope the gentleman will urge that on his committee.

Mr. ARCHER. Then the Naval Committee would assume a power which this House ought to assume, to determine whether or not Congress intends to acknowledge the belligerent rights of the Cuban people. It is not within our province—I mean within the province of the Naval Committee—after the vote by which the bill was passed and sent to the Senate, that we should arrogate this to ourselves.

Mr. BECK. Was not that done at a time when war seemed to be imminent?

Mr. ARCHER. Not more imminent, I believe, than it is at this moment.

Mr. BECK. Have not reports been put in that we knew the condition of the Virginius six months ago, and that we have put ourselves in a position which cannot be very gratifying even to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER?]

Mr. ARCHER. It matters not what may have been the position of the Virginius. Our duty is the same as though she had been a pirate, provided the American citizens on board of her were innocently on board of her, and knew not that she was a pirate when they went there; and when they claim as American citizens the protection of the flag, the Government should see that they are protected.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When the bill to increase the number of enlisted men in the Navy to ten thousand was before the House, I stated, the bill being under my charge, that I would not of myself have agreed to enlarge the number of men in the Navy on account of our supposed difficulties with Spain alone, because I had no doubt that the Virginius would be in one of our ports in a very few days. I happened to know, what I suppose was unknown to the House generally or to the country, that the order for her delivery had been given and a vessel had been sent from this country to Cuba in order to receive her. And therefore I stated that I would not, on account of any threatened difficulties with Spain, vote to enlarge the number of men, if I had not been of opinion that the Navy needed this enlargement all the time for its ordinary purposes. Ever since I have been the chairman of the Naval Committee the Navy Department have been urging the necessity of more men, and I had at last become fully convinced that they ought to have more men for the ordinary force of the Navy; and the committee had concluded to report that increase of men. This statement, Mr. Chairman, was made to the House at the time the bill was on its passage.

Mr. BECK. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] this question: Does he believe that this House, but for the impression that was upon the minds of its members that war was imminent, or that there was danger of it, would have increased the Navy from eighty-five hundred to ten thousand men? No matter what his individual opinion was, if he had told us that he knew then that there was no danger, does he believe the House would have done it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believe the House would never have passed that bill if they had not had this Cuba-Spanish craze. The whole country had it, too, at that time. But I was frank enough to state to the House that that did not affect me, and I believe it did not affect the committee. They reported the bill because they believed we needed that force all the time, even if we had had no difficulties with Spain. And if the House was fairly treated by the committee which reported the bill, they have no right to complain if they did what they may think now they should not have done.

Mr. BECK. Does the gentleman not think that it was his duty to have told the House what he now tells us he knew at that time?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I could not tell the House, because that would be telling the country what I knew at that time; but I do state that I had the best evidence to believe the Virginius would be in our ports in a very few days. And the committee did not ask the House to pass the bill on account of any threatening difficulties with Spain.

Mr. ARCHER. I shall now resume the floor, after I have yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for a question.

Mr. COX. If I can get the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] I wish to ask him how long before that bill was reported he knew that the Virginius would be sent back to our ports?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I cannot say now.

Mr. COX. Was it when that peculiar bill was in committee?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I never said anything to the committee about it. I happened to learn almost accidentally that a vessel had been detailed for the purpose of receiving the Virginius. I received the fact in such a way that I was not in a condition to communicate it.

Mr. COX. Then the gentleman regarded it not as a war measure, but as a peace measure?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I did so regard it. I judged from the complaints of the Navy Department, and from the representations made by naval men to the committee at the time, that we needed this additional number of men. When we sent a single vessel to join a squadron abroad we had to get a number of men to man the ship we sent out, and we had difficulty in getting them. We did not have the relays that were necessary, and the Navy was complaining all the time.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one more question. Did he know at that time the peculiar circumstances under which the Virginius was to be delivered to us; that we were to omit the salute to our flag; that the Virginius, in other words, was to be sneaked out of Havana; that she was to be sent to a distant bay and there delivered?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not know if anybody knew all that. [A laugh.]

Mr. COX. I did not suppose that you did.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs whether, admitting that a force of ten thousand men was necessary for the Navy, it was a matter which required legislation to be brought into this House and passed through a furor of war, and whether it is his duty now to obtain a repeal of that law?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I believed we needed the men all the time, and if anybody else voted under the furor, they were properly informed about it by the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I voted under patriotism; a patriotism which the Government did not exhibit.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. ARCHER. I will yield for a moment longer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think gentlemen are laboring under a misapprehension as to a matter of fact. The Secretary of the Navy sent in a letter to the House of Representatives, setting forth that when the emergency arose he took the authority, assumed it in order to meet the emergency, of increasing the number of enlisted men in the Navy to ten thousand; that in doing so he exceeded the law; and he laid the facts before Congress, and asked Congress to pass a condoning law and an additional sum of money to pay for the enlistment of the additional men. He asked the Committee on Appropriations to legalize his action; but the committee told him that they could give him an appropriation but could not in an appropriation bill legalize what he had done contrary to law; and that he had better call upon the Naval Committee to bring in a condoning act authorizing this temporary increase of the Navy. We referred that very letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they brought in a bill, not to provide for a permanent increase of the Navy, but to condone what had been done by the Secretary in the emergency.

Mr. ARCHER. By referring to the Navy Register of 1873 we find the following classification of vessels:

*In this number of guns are included 41 howitzers.

I will now proceed to classify the different vessels, with their approximate cost. The Colorado, Wabash, Minnesota, and Franklin cost $3,795,000. The three first named were built eighteen years ago, and the Franklin was launched ten years ago. They were built with auxiliary steam-power, and their average speed under steam is not over seven knots.

The Niagara was pulled to pieces for repairs, work suspended on her, and the vessel has so deteriorated that she cannot be rebuilt.

Of the 31 second rates, 5 have never been launched, but have rotted on the stocks. The Nevada and California were condemned, having been constructed of green timber.

In 1869 a board of naval officers was ordered to examine into the condition of the vessels of the Navy, and their report was laid before Congress. The board stated that the Florida, Iowa, and Tennessee were worthless for war purposes; that the Severn, Congress, Worcester, Benicia, Alaska, Omaha, and Plymouth are white-oak vessels, and not to be classed as ships of war, although some of them have represented the country abroad. The aggregate cost of the above vessels was $11,248,000, and they are characterized by the board as the offspring of irretrievable blunders.

The Delaware and Illinois are decayed; on them over $2,000,000 were expended.

The Susquehanna is eighteen years old, and has gone to the scrap-heap. The Powhatan and Saranac, side-wheel steamers, are twenty-five years old, and although in service for want of better vessels, have outlived their natural term of existence. The 5 ships of the Lancaster class, with the 4 old frigates, are the only vessels in the service deserving the title of ships of war, and even they are not at all suited to go into battle with more modern vessels or resist the improved ordnance at present in use. The Lackawanna class, carrying 10 guns, have been somewhat improved, but still possess so many defects as to be very objectionable ships of war. They are slow under sail and under steam, and have no room for provisions or coal.

Of the 23 third rates, the Juniata and Ossipee can neither sail nor steam fast, and are dangerous at sea. In a recent gale the Ossipee lost all her boats.

The Quinnebang, Swatara, and Galena have all gone to decay, but, like the Phœnix, are rising from their ashes with new live-oak frames. What they will be remains to be seen a year hence.

The Mohican, Iroquois, Kearsarge, Wachusett, Tuscarora, and Wyoming are a fair class of vessels, but too small to cope with ships of any size. They steam and sail well, however, and would do irreparable damage to an enemy's commerce.

The Navy is much in need of such vessels with modern improvements.

The Mohican is rotten, the Nantasket in like condition, and the Narragansett is so slow she can scarcely keep out of her own way. Thus, out of these 31 vessels, only 5 are fit for service.

In the East Indies we have 2 old "double-enders," the Monocacy and Ashuelot. These cruise in the rivers of China, and are too unseaworthy to be sent home. Everybody conversant with naval matters is aware of the utter worthlessness of this class of vessels, and in what a spirit of stupidity they were conceived. It is only strange they have not long ago proved coffins for all on board of them, yet these offsprings of the late war are classed among the ships upon which the country must depend in case of hostilities. Even the Chinese laugh at them as inferior to their junks.

The Nyack, Shawmut, Kansas, Nipsic, Saco, and Yantic are small 3-gun vessels, whose best point is their imposing appearance since being rigged as full ships. Such vessels may delude the Chinese, but cannot deceive those accustomed to ships of war. The Nyack is in Rotten Row, in California, where all the rest of her class will go in the course of two years, at the end of which time they will be literally worn out.

RECAPITULATION OF STEAMERS.

On the stocks, work suspended, and decayed	16
Worthless	2
Under reconstruction, which will require six months	2
Number not to be classed as ships of war	5
Total number of steamers not available	25

Leaving a remainder of 38 available vessels, including the 10 ships reported by the board of naval officers "worthless as ships of war."

Of the sailing-vessels, the New Orleans, at Sackett's Harbor, and Virginia, at the Boston navy-yard, have been on the stocks since 1818, and are both rotten. Six are receiving-ships, and are mostly decayed, their decks in some cases not permitting the exercise of guns, and the spars and rigging in such condition that the men cannot be sent aloft to exercise sails. Most of these vessels have attained the usual age at which an admiral in the Navy is retired, and were formerly put down in the register as mounting 74 guns each.

The average age of our sailing-ships, leaving out the Idaho and fourth rates, is thirty-seven years.

The Constitution was built in 1797, and is all in pieces, to be patched up for the centennial celebration. The Independence, at Mare Island, is fifty-nine years old, is decayed, and is used as a receiving-ship. The Vandalia and Marion, built in 1828 and 1829, are being converted into screw-steamers, and will not be ready for sea under six months, and even then will be but a small addition to our naval force. These vessels are now on the register as carrying 12 guns—a system of estimating batteries that has existed since 1818; but which affords no clew to the actual force of our ships.

The Portsmouth sailing sloop-of-war, with a light battery, is absent surveying the Pacific Ocean. Being engaged in peaceful pursuits she is unprepared for war, and in case of hostilities would be an easy prey to some 1-gun steamer that could take position and cut her to pieces.

Four of the sailing-vessels are store-ships. The Idaho, built at an expense of $500,000, is lying at Yokohama, Japan, good for nothing, and has been ordered sold and the money turned into the Treasury.

Four of the sailing-vessels are used as practice-ships at the Naval Academy, and as ordnance-vessels; but none are in condition to go to war for want of steam-power; and although noted in the register as carrying a certain number of guns, they are, in some cases, not armed at all, and in others have only unserviceable ordnance.

All the old ships of the line, once so formidable, are used as receiving-ships. They are mostly gone to decay; are unfit for sea; and it would be unwise to expend money on them, as no officer would wish to command such vessels in time of war.

When Ericsson built his little Monitor and it was launched against the plated-vessel Merrimac, all the wooden ships of the line went to cover, as sportsmen say, and from that day to this no vessels of that kind have been used for battle in foreign navies. All experienced seamen knew how useless a sacrifice it must be to bring these ancient structures into action against the thickly-plated war-vessels of the present day. Had we vessels of this kind now with steam-power we should probably use them from sheer necessity, as we did unfit vessels during the war of the States, when the indomitable spirit of our officers undertook the most difficult enterprises and succeeded, to the surprise of all Europe, whose officers predicted certain defeat.

We have no right to ask men to sacrifice themselves when we deny them the means to insure success.

Naval officers do not fight for pleasure, but from a stern necessity and the orders of their Government. The Navy was not made as an amusement for naval officers, but to protect the honor and interests of the Republic when assailed by foreign arrogance; and if we expect success, we must give the Navy the means of accomplishing it.

We send our officers to school at an annual expense of $120,000, and educate them to the highest professional standard; that is, we educate them to be killed in defense of their country and make them food for gunpowder. We expect them to conquer or die, and woe be to the officer in command of a 5-gun ship who should be obliged to strike his flag to an enemy of four times his force; the nation, in its humiliated vanity, would never forgive him. We expect everything from naval officers, and yet deny them the means to accomplish the ends in view. It is like telling a man to walk the rope across Niagara Falls, and giving him a thread to walk on.

I will now refer to our iron-clad navy, of which so much has been said and so much repeated. Constant allusions are made to the great efficiency of this part of our naval force and the wonders to be accomplished by their formidable guns. There stand on the Navy Register 48 vessels of this class, carrying 121 guns, and were they really good vessels this would be a formidable force; but they were built without due consideration of what they were to accomplish.

Originally intended for coast and harbor defense, they have been made to do the duty of sea-going vessels, for which they are utterly unsuited.

In his report for 1871 the present Chief Naval Constructor speaks of the iron-clads, as follows:

> Very little can be said in their favor; 40 of the 51 vessels are of less than five hundred tons measurement, cannot carry a modern battery, have very little speed, and consequently cannot be of much use in fighting an enemy in an offing or in protecting a harbor.

They were built in violation of established principles of naval architecture, and have been of no practical service to the country, unless their name "iron-clads" has spread terror throughout the world. Four of the largest iron-clads are now on the stocks, two of which are too much decayed to be completed and should be broken up.

Referring to the Secretary of the Navy's report of 1869–'70, he says:

> The remainder of the Navy, not in commission, consisted first of 46 iron-clads and monitors of every class, laid up at various stations, none of which could be got ready for service without thorough overhauling and extensive repairs to hull and machinery, and of which 32 had been condemned and ordered to be sold as not adapted to our service, 26 of them never having been in commission.

The Secretary should have added, that after being built these latter vessels barely floated and that was all, and that had their batteries been placed upon them they would have gone to the bottom.

Some twenty of these, called light-draught monitors, were all built on one plan, but whose plan no one ever found out. Like "Japhet in search of a father," no paternity has been discovered for them. They were built during Mr. Welles's administration, and benefited nobody except the contractors.

No naval officer had anything to do with these vessels, nor gave any advice in relation to them, but all condemned them from the beginning. They cost upwards of $15,000,000, and stand a frightful monument of the folly of designing vessels in which officers are to fight, without consulting their experience in such matters.

In fact, for the past fifteen years the Navy has been most sadly managed from the absence of the proper naval advice and experience in the designing of ships, and the only thing built during that period approaching a success was the "New Ironsides," planned and superintended by Rear-Admiral Joseph Smith.

This vessel was allowed to burn up, as she was a reproach to the failures by which she was surrounded.

An attempt was made to sell these so-called "light-draught monitors," and a few were disposed of for old iron, bringing but a few thousand dollars. For two now at the navy-yard $2,500 was offered, but the Government declined to sell, as they would answer for rafts in case it was desired to block up a channel.

Here, then, at once disappear 40 of the 121 heavy guns yearly reported in the Navy Register, which report, however, let me repeat, did not originate with the present Secretary of the Navy.

Then there is another lot of monitors—the Mahopac class. Three of these, the Mahopac, Manhattan, and Saugus, have been repaired and improved as far as the nature of the vessels would permit, and are now at Key West. Yet, although, as they are now, they are good vessels in smooth water and for harbor defense, they were never intended for a sea voyage. Such, however, are the necessities of the Navy Department that the Seretary has either to send these vessels to sea or else have the Cuban coast without ships of war when it is necessary that every gun should be there. These monitors must all be towed to Cuba. Their hatches are battened down, and all holes, including ventilators, closed up, so that the inmates are nearly stifled and have to take turns on the little turret to catch a mouthful of fresh air.

If they should get adrift from the vessel towing them (a not unusual circumstance) the chances are they will founder in the gale or be run over by some passing vessel that cannot see them in the dark. Let me ask, is this the kind of vessel on which such a nation as ours should depend for victory, or on which to condemn their officers and men to serve at sea?

For harbor defense the monitors have no superiors, for they can run into shoal water out of the way of the great leviathan rams which all nations but our own possess, and which in an open sea would run through a fleet of these vessels, sinking and scattering them in all directions.

Imagine one of the best of our monitors exchanging shots with the iron-clad Numancia. The latter, displacing some ten thousand tons and going at the rate of fourteen knots, would strike the monitor with a force of one hundred and thirty thousand foot-tons, which would capsize her like a turtle and send her with all hands to the bottom. It is for such work that these large vessels are built.

The largest of our iron-clads, the Amphitrite and Terror, are both rotten—the former unable to carry her coal and provisions. The latter is being prepared as well as circumstances will admit to go to the West Indies.

Some of our iron-clads have been miscalled sea-going, but there are none of them that properly come within that category. Such as were so called are now almost worthless. The Roanoke is scarcely fit for harbor defense; the Puritan now lies at League Island with only her machinery and boilers on board, and the Dictator is undergoing such repairs as the Department can give her preparatory to joining the fleet in the West Indies. She may arrive out there in safety, but there are chances against it.

These vessels are all failures. They were built by contract during the rebellion at a cost of $4,000,000. They are condemned by professional men except for harbor defense, though officers go on them without flinching, notwithstanding their unsuitableness for making war outside of six fathoms of water. Four of this class, each of a tonnage of 2,117, are now on the stocks. They were commenced in 1862, and have attained a rotten condition without ever having dropped into salt water. The cost of these four vessels was over $4,000,000.

The number of available iron-clads at this moment is very small, amounting in all to 6, only 3 of which are ready for sea. Thus of the great list of iron-clads in the register, 42, carrying 84 guns, are available for service. After the launching of the first light-draught monitor, with all the tinkering that could be done to her, there was no expectation of utilizing the others, and they remain at League Island—a monument to the stupidity that designed them. Thus it will be seen that the total number of guns available in monitors is 14; and in the course of four months five or six more of these vessels, mounting an equal number of guns, may be got ready. That is all the Department can do in this direction without incurring a very heavy expense for which Congress makes no appropriation.

A recapitulation shows that out of 121 guns named in the register, we can count on 14 guns now, and 14 guns more in four months' time.

Among the vessels reckoned available are 27 tugs, such as you may see any day in the Delaware or in New York Harbor, tugging merchant-ships to sea. They vary in size from thirty to three hundred tons, and some are built of wood, others of iron. The Polaris, lost in the Arctic expedition, still figures on the Navy list, and other tugs are employed in towing vessels in and out, or running from the navy-yard to the powder-station. None of them are fit to carry anything larger than a howitzer, and few of them have any speed. For want of better vessels several of the tugs have been fitted as torpedo-boats, and one or two used as dispatch-vessels at Key West; but such craft do not enter into the number of war-vessels, and their names on the register only serve to delude people with the idea that we have an effective Navy.

In the above statement you have the facts, which can easily be verified by a reference to the reports of the Secretaries of the Navy since 1861, in which all these things are set forth, and they are particularly noted in the report of the board of which Rear-Admiral Goldsborough was president in 1861-'62. It is a humiliating story to tell, and it looks as if some one had neglected his duty, but as Congress has made no appropriation whatever for the repair of these vesssls or to supply their places, we must conclude that the Navy Department is not to blame; but the blame is with us. The magnificent bubble of 167 ships and 1,200 guns has been pricked, and the indisputable fact remains that we have only a Navy on paper, and it has required herculean efforts on the occasion of the Cuban imbroglio to get a few ships to sea to maintain the honor of the flag, which is on the ocean in the keeping of our Navy. Out of all our ships afloat when these troubles broke out we could only command 37 vessels, carrying 530 guns, in the European, North Atlantic, and South Atlantic waters, to recall which would leave our commerce, in case of war, at the mercy of the smallest privateer the Spaniards could send to sea. You naturally ask, "What has become of all the money appropriated for naval purposes since 1861?"

During the war $280,000,000 were spent for the Navy, out of which all the above-mentioned vessels were built or contracted to be built; and it is safe to say that in no country were there ever so many frightful failures made, or so little professional knowledge brought to bear. Naval officers were not consulted in the construction of these vessels, and contractors made large fortunes out of the life-blood of the service.

Since the war $203,000,000 have been expended, but this has gone for the annual expenses, as $400,000,000 have gone for the annual expenses of the Army. Some of the annual appropriations have gone toward saving from actual destruction the few good ships we had left after the war, and in keeping up the navy-yards to meet the increasing demands of the country, the utility of which has been seen in the rapid manner in which our available ships have been fitted for sea on the present occasion.

And now the condition of the whole Navy has been fairly stated, and there is no remedy for many mistakes of the past. The only thing to be done is to avoid such expensive errors in the future; but this cannot be done unless the subject is thoroughly examined and the remedy applied in the proper place. Let us have no more such frightful failures as have made us the laughing-stock of the world, and left us, at the moment when our flag has been outraged and our citizens butchered, without the means of forcing compliance with our just demands in case they had been refused. Let us build up the Navy anew, and place our officers in possession of means to do what the American people demand of them in case of war. We may hold our own against imbecile Spain in case we should drift into war with her, but if so, it will be owing more to the indomitable energy of our officers than to the aid Congress has given them.

And now let me say a few words with regard to our future policy in building ships.

Heretofore the naval element has been ignored altogether, and designs for ships of war have been intrusted to men who have never been on the ocean, and who, no matter how great may be their mechanical ability, know very little of the qualities required in a ship of war. The result has been those miserable failures which have cost so much money, and left the Navy in time of necessity in no condition to meet emergencies.

No ships should be built unless the plans are approved by the highest professional ability in the Navy, for no men are so well qualified to pass judgment in such matters as officers who have commanded ships and fleets in peace and war, who have studied the best specimens of naval architecture abroad, and who have devoted their life-time to their profession.

One would suppose that the hearts of our officers would fail them when ordered to give battle to an enemy ten times their superior in ships and ordnance; but still they obey orders with alacrity, never thinking of objecting to the feeble arrangements which they know offer almost certain destruction to them in case they should encounter any of the improved vessels of war.

When the original Monitor encountered the Merrimac in smooth water at Hampton Roads, which was the most desirable condition of affairs for her, and held the monster at bay, all Europe was astounded; they saw that the day for wooden ships in action was over, and they laid aside their large vessels and constructed new ones of the heaviest iron—far superior to anything we ever built. They commenced where we left off, and have so far outstripped us that England now has an iron-clad fleet that we could not prevent entering any of our principal harbors.

One of her heavy iron-clads would go through our entire fleet unless an accidental shot from our fifteen-inch guns should disable her, which would be a mere chance. Nothing in our Navy could stand the crushing power of these vessels, and our array of guns would dwindle in one battle to a very small fraction.

With the lights of European experience to guide us we have done nothing; and notwithstanding the warning we have had we shall very likely continue to do nothing, until some day this nation will be so humiliated before the world that there will be a howl from one end of the Union to the other.

We are not wanting in skilled mechanics to carry out the plans of experienced naval officers, who are alone familiar with the best models in foreign navies, have seen the ships in service, have heard them criticised in all points by their officers, and have noted the defects which we should avoid in constructing such vessels. England has made some failures in her great experimental vessels, but they are nothing in comparison to our own, and have cost not half as much.

England, to-day, can hold in check with her iron-clad fleet all the navies of the world. It is her policy to build such ships. The safety of her coasts and the interests of her great commerce demand it. We have a like interest at stake. Our coast is as important to us as England's to her, and our once more increasing commerce demands our fostering care. Our policy should be to build as heavy iron-clads as any nation on earth, and with the best speed, for without speed ships are of little use. We should have a certain number of powerful monitors, ready at a moment's notice to keep an enemy from our harbors, for our late experience in war tells us that ships don't hesitate to attack and silence forts, or pass them when the opportunity presents itself.

History shows us that in no instance have forts alone been able to withstand the concentrated fire of ships properly directed. Witness Nelson at Copenhagen, Exmouth at Algiers, Duckworth at the Dardanelles, the English at Acre, the French at Vera Cruz, and our own success against New Orleans, Mobile, and Fort Fisher.

All these facts should be seriously considered, and wise men should ask, "What is the remedy, under similar circumstances, that may be forced upon us ere we know it?"

Part of our further policy should be to build fair-sized, swift cruisers that can keep the sea for a long period and destroy an enemey's commerce. This is the shortest way to finish the contest, for when a war begins to affect commerce there is always a loud cry for peace.

England could not long continue a war with a nation well supplied with fast cruisers, and for that reason she has adopted that system herself, only building six vessels of that kind to our one. She does not stop to consider the expense when providing for the safety of the nation and its vast commerce.

We spend thirty or forty millions a year for an army to keep down the Indians on our frontier, and are ready at any moment to double the amount for the raising of troops, to say nothing of spending millions in gratuities to the different tribes to keep them peaceful. Is our sea-board with its millions of people less dear to the country than the comparative handful of hardy pioneers, who are quite able to take care of themselves if permitted to do so?

In case of foreign war, which we are as likely to have as any nation, the seas would swarm with privateers, swift vessels that none of our cruisers could catch; and the sooner we go to work the sooner we shall be prepared for the emergency. When the proper number and kind of iron-clads are built there will be no more expense, as the vessels will endure for a century if properly cared for; and when the wooden ships are built they can be kept in repair with the ordinary appropriations, provided proper economy is exercised; and the number of mechanics in the navy-yards in time of peace be limited by law, unless the threatened approach of hostilities requires us in the absence of Congress to make needful preparations.

One word about our shipping system or enlistment of seamen. When an occasion occurs for increasing the naval forces, the hands of the Department should not be tied, but the Secretary ought to have authority to ship as many men as the manning of the vessels require. What is the use of ships if the Navy Department is unable to man them? There is no fear of any Secretary of the Navy overstepping the bounds of discretion. The Department would more likely keep within the limit, if it was liberal, than go beyond it. It is a difficult thing to get seamen in a hurry, especially in the summer time, when work is plenty and business brisk in the commercial line. Even now, when winter has blocked up the avenues of trade, and the commerce of the lakes is suspended for the season, sailors offer slowly because the inducements to enter the service are insufficient. Time after time the naval authorities have urged upon Congress the importance of supplying seamen with an outfit of clothing similar to that allowed soldiers and marines, for they are better entitled to it than either of the former. There is no reason why an outfit should be withheld from them, especially as in the Navy the wages are one-third less than in the merchant service. Now, every man in the Navy is in debt at the end of the year; hence so many desertions and the difficulty in keeping ships properly manned.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, desirous of giving any bill reported from a committee so respectable as is the Committee on Appropriations candid and careful consideration, I feel very much embarrassed in attempting to address the committee to-day on this bill, because it came into my hands only this morning. It will be recollected that the bill was reported the day before yesterday, late in the afternoon, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-day. And until I could get possession of the bill itself it was, of course, impossible for me to give to it that attention which its importance demands. I feel, sir, not only embarrassed in attempting to discuss this bill from that cause, but additionally so because I find myself differing for the first time with friends on this side of the House with reference to the bill itself. Indeed, sir, I differ with the gentleman who has reported the bill in behalf of the Committee on Appropriations as to the fact of the alleged reductions; I differ entirely with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] as to the fact stated by him, that, in his opinion, the amount appropriated is entirely insufficient for the ordinary expenditures of the Navy; I differ also from my friend from Maryland, who goes much further and wants to give this country a largely increased naval establishment.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman will allow me to state that I intended to say that the amount at present included in the bill is far below what I know they will call upon us to give them before they get through.

Mr. WOOD. I understood the gentleman subsequently to say, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] that he thought this would be an insufficient sum for the purpose.

Mr. BECK. O, no, sir.

Mr. WOOD. Then I misunderstood the gentleman, and, of course, I take that back.

But before proceeding to give the reasons for this difference of opinion, I desire to call the attention of the committee to some reflections which present themselves to me. Sir, before we proceed to consider one of the most important appropriation bills that may be reported to this House for its consideration, before we enter upon this great and important question of the disbursement of public money, I desire the House to remember precisely the attitude of the people of this country and the condition of its Treasury, because we cannot expend if we have not got the money, and it is a very pertinent and appropriate consideration to know in advance where the money is to come from.

We all know the lesson of last fall, and the unfortunate condition of the material interests of the country, growing out of what is popularly known as the panic, so destructive to many and injurious to all. We all know that one of the deepest and gravest lessons taught by that sad experience was the absolute necessity for economy. Every individual in the ordinary transactions of life, in his own individual disbursements, first thought how he should reduce his expenditures. The people of this country, instead of continuing the extravagance which had grown up during and since the war, have been endeavoring by every possible means to reduce their expenses to the lowest minimum.

The next point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Committee of the Whole is the embarrassment of the public Treasury. We find our revenues falling off, our internal revenue materially decreasing, and our receipts from foreign imports also materially decreasing. We find the Secretary of the Treasury, driven by the necessities of the case, and in my judgment, as has been properly stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] illegally and unwarrantably, to lay his hands upon a reserve that was as much a sacred deposit in the Treasury as any other special deposit may be in a bank, or the pockets of an individual. He was compelled to dishonor the credit of the United States or to draw upon the reserve fund of $44,000,000, which in my judgment the law gave him no right to do. But from the necessities of the case he did it; and I apprehend that Congress, in view of the circumstances, will be quite willing to pardon that extreme exercise of power.

What was the next step? Upon the assembling of Congress, within five days after we assembled in this Capitol, the Secretary of the Treasury sent us a requisition for additional taxation, internal and external, to the extent of $42,000,000, to supply this deficiency. So urgent was the case that he requested that before our holiday vacation we should pass such a bill into a law, so that he could immediately fill up this vacuum in the Treasury, and supply the deficiency which the circumstances of the country and the loss of the revenue had created. Taxation was demanded—more taxation upon the people of the United States at this juncture in their affairs. More taxation pending the absolute starvation of working men in this country, the prostration of our commerce, our trade paralyzed, and industry itself ahungered and starving.

Well, sir, what did Congress do? What did this House do? However others may reproach the action of this House for sins of omission and commission, I say that it deserves lasting credit for the course it took in response to this demand of the Secretary of the Treasury. Instead of complying with this demand for taxation upon the people, this House paused. It did as a practical, common-sense man would do when embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances. It said, "First Mr. Secretary, before proceeding to this extreme measure, we will cut down expenditrres; we will not borrow; we will not tax, but we will see if we can reduce our expenses." A plain, homely, practical, Anglo-Saxon principle, coming home to the common sense and good judgment of every man in the country.

Then it was that the Committee on Ways and Means, through the Committee on Appropriations and by their consent and advice, with entire unanimity, reported to this House that the estimates furnished us by the Departments should be referred back to the Administration, that before we would provide the ways and means we would see if we could not reduce the expenditures so as to be brought within the revenues accruing to the Government, and avoid both more debt and more taxation. The resolution passed this House with entire unanimity, directing the several Departments of the Government to report to this House, on the 5th day of January, how far they could revise and reduce the estimates made by them for appropriations required to meet the expenditures of the Government.

Now, sir, I do not wish to say anything in derogation of the Committee on Appropriations. I believe that committee to be industrious, to be composed of gentlemen of intellect and integrity. But I cannot commend that committee when in advance of these revised estimates it reports its leading appropriation bills. Before the 5th day of January they brought in their Army appropriation bill, appropriating, I believe, about $28,449,000. And on Tuesday last, the 6th day of January, before the revised estimates had been received, they reported the Navy appropriation bill, proposing to appropriate between fifteen and sixteen million dollars more. And all this in contravention of their own action, by which they virtually declared to the world that until those revised estimates came in and were considered they would withhold the appropriation bills, in order to see how far they could be reduced to the present condition of the times and of the Treasury.

These are the facts; the fact of almost utter national and individual bankruptcy; the fact of a demand by this Administration for more taxation; the fact that this House has declared that before it will proceed to tax it will reduce expenses.

Now, does this bill show a reduction? Notwithstanding the able argument of the gentleman who reports it, when considered with the previous bill, already passed, it is not a reduction. This bill is not, with the four millions voted, a reduction of the ordinary annual expenses of the Navy Department, as compared with the last six years. On the contrary, the two bills, the one we have passed already appropriating $4,000,000, and this bill, make an aggregate of $20,505,856, which is more than for any year since 1866 except one—the last. I hold the official statement in my hand and challenge contradiction. There is no reduction proposed by this bill. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] argued very elaborately and with ingenuity to show that there was a reduction. He told us, however, that the reduction was only in the civil force. Well, sir, I do not know what he calls this civil force of the Navy Department. I find no reduction in the Marine Corps, which is utterly useless.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman must be mistaken; he cannot have examined the bill. The Marine Corps is cut down nearly 25 per cent.; the force in the Marine Corps is cut down exactly 25 per cent.

Mr. WOOD. One moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is misled by a misprint of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. I am not responsible for errors in the printing of this bill. The bill, I presume, was printed as reported, and when it is criticised we are told that it is a misprint.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The misprint applies only to a single part of the bill. If the gentleman will examine the figures he will find that they show a reduction of 25 per cent. in the appropriations for the Marine Corps. And before the gentleman states that any particular item in this bill is not in the direction of economy because it does not show a reduction, he had better examine the figures of this bill in compraison with the act of last year.

Mr. WOOD. I have done so, sir; and I can show (though I had intended to reserve that part of my discussion until we should take up the bill by paragraphs) that the most important part of this bill is precisely in accordance with the original estimates sent in here from the Department—precisely.

One of the most remarkable paragraphs ever placed in an appropriation bill since the foundation of the Government may be found on the first page of this bill. For the edification of the House I will read it:

> For pay of commissioned and warrant officers at sea, on shore, on special service, and of those on the retired list and unemployed; and for mileage and transportation of officers traveling under orders; and for pay of the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men of the engineer's force, and for the coast survey service, eighty-five hundred men——
> Now, mark—
> Eighty-five hundred men, at an average pay of $300 each per annum, $6,250,000.

In other words, the object is to have it go forth to this House and the world that all these expenditures, amounting to over $6,000,000—over one-third of the whole amount—are on the basis of only $300 per annum per man, as if these men were paid by annual compensation; while the fact is that there is included in this item a variety of other subjects not comprehended within their compensation or pay at all.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman will allow me a word just here, to begin with that clause, "at an average pay of $300 each per annum," is in the bill by a mistake of the clerk; it was directed by the committee to be struck out, because it might mislead gentlemen of the House. But in addition to the pay of these men, whatever it may average, this item of $6,250,000 includes the pay of all the vast number of officers of the Navy, whose pay in every instance is fixed by letter of law as clearly and as plainly as the salary of the gentleman and myself is fixed. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. I doubt whether the gentleman's salary is fixed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It may not be fixed for the future; but it is fixed as to the present.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman has stated accurately, I have no doubt, that the aggregate sum here proposed to be appropriated is in pursuance of existing law; but in all my experience of legislation, covering nearly a third of a century, I have never yet known any appropriation bill to contain a paragraph of this character. I recollect Mr. Benton's declaration in regard to "a stump speech in the body of a bill;" but this is, in my judgment, far worse than anything to which he could possibly have referred.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is the clause that troubles the gentleman?

Mr. WOOD. "Three hundred dollars each per annum."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Have I not stated that the committee directed that to be struck out because it might mislead and is useless? I shall, when the bill comes to be considered by paragraphs, move that that be struck out.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I supposed that we were discussing and passing upon the bill as reported by the committee. The committee have had the advantage of discussion; they have matured and reported this measure; they have precipitated action upon it. The gentleman from Maine when he reported his bill on the day before yesterday, would not wait three days, but demanded that we should take it up and consider it at once; and now, when he discovers that the bill is full of errors, he complains that we discuss the bill as it is before us.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Has not the gentleman himself, during his long experience on this floor, sometimes reported bills which, upon examination, he found to contain verbal errors that had crept in through the oversight of clerks?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, Mr. Chairman; but I never knew any member, fathering a bill and occupying the floor for one hour to discuss it, who did not, before beginning the discussion, point out such errors to the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I supposed the gentleman would look at larger subjects than this.

Mr. WOOD. I suppose the gentleman considers $6,250,000 a small matter.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman's criticism does not affect the amount. I do not understand him to find fault with that, but merely with a verbal error.

Mr. WOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to refer to this, but the gentleman's questions have drawn the difficulty upon himself; he cannot hold me responsible. I have said that this bill proposes no reduction. That is a general proposition, and in making it I do not propose to go into the details of the bill.

I assume when we take up the bill, paragraph by paragraph, every gentleman will have an opportunity to show what errors there are and what reduction should be made. But I make the general declaration that, notwithstanding the long and beautiful explanation of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] notwithstanding his glorification of the American Navy and the beautiful history he gave us of the prowess, the power, and success of the American Navy, when he comes down to facts and figures he will find that he is entirely mistaken in supposing that substantially the Navy Department is in the line of reduction. I deny that there is any economy there. We have already passed a bill last month in which we have appropriated for the pay of the Navy, for the contingent expenses of the Navy, for the Bureau of Navigation, the Bureau of Ordnance, the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting, Yards and Docks, Provisions and Clothing, Steam Engineering, and Construction and Repair, $4,000,000.

I know the gentleman will reply to me and say, "Yes; but that was an extraordinary appropriation; that it was outside of the annual appropriation; that it arose out of the Virginius difficulty." He will endeavor to show that $4,000,000 were spent in three weeks, because that was the whole period the Secretary of the Navy was going from navy-yard to navy-yard personally scrutinizing and inspecting the preparation for making these extraordinary expenditures.

But the bill individualized and itemized the purpose for which that appropriation was made. And it is a physical impossibility that amount could be expended in that period for any such purpose. Indeed, the gentleman has told us but recently in this side discussion between himself and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] in his attempt to eulogize and defend the action of the Secretary in resorting to these extraordinary means in that period of excitement, that he had not used it all; that a great deal of it was not needed; that he held some of the vessels in reserve. I am very glad to hear it; and if it be so it is an additional reason why I am right in stating that it is a part and parcel of the regular appropriations made by Congress for that Department, because every dollar expended went for material and supplies. Where are that material and those supplies? They are not destroyed. They could not have been eaten up by the Cubans. They must have a physical existence at this time. They are as good to-day for the purpose of use by that Department as they were then. Therefore, sir, I think I am right in the assumption that $4,000,000 is part of the appropriation made to the Navy Department, and to that extent does away with the necessity for making any additional appropriation now.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman answer me one question? Will he tell me how it is that nearly $3,000,000, or, perhaps, quite that, out of the $4,000,000, expended as it was upon iron-clads and monitors needed in view of the impending immediate conflict, and which iron-clads and monitors were lying up in our navy-yards in time of peace, can be reckoned as an appropriation for the general Navy in time of peace? How does the naval establishment, which we continue from year to year on a peace footing, get the benefit of a dollar of that emergency appropriation?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the answer is very easy.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is it?

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will keep quiet I will tell him. Vessels of war, I assume, are always, when in service, prepared for aggression or defense. There is no such thing as a peace basis or a peace footing for the Navy when on duty. We have not been expending $20,000,0000 annually since 1866 for nothing. It was to provide a naval force for the protection of the country and its mercantile marine in foreign ports, and to be ready at all times to meet a foreign enemy to the extent of its power. You cannot make me believe these extraordinary expenditures which, as he says now, were expressly for war purposes, are not as good for war purposes to-day as then, when war threatened us. It is impossible a dollar of that money, except that portion eaten up by the extraordinary number of men, necessary perhaps at that time, has gone forever. So far as iron-clads are concerned, so far as supplies are concerned, so far as equipments appertaining to fitting out a ship, whether in war or peace, I say it is there yet if the money was expended, and if it was not expended, it is still or should be on hand. But we have appropriated it, and he says he had expended it, or was in the course of expending it. When that bill was under discussion I made the point, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, answered me. I asked the question whether this money was necessary for contracts made or absolute expenditures agreed on for the Navy, and he replied to me that it was for contracts made for purposes of the Navy.

Now, I will say that when an effort is made here to make the House and the country believe that the $4,000,000 expended by the Secretary of the Navy during the three weeks of excitement when we expected from hour to hour to be plunged into war—and I do not censure him for what he did—when an effort is made to divert that to a separate purpose, and make us believe that that $4,000,000 has eternally gone, common sense rejects that proposition, and I do not believe it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman will permit me a word, it is this: I give it up. I cannot convince him. Where a man says there is no difference between a peace footing and a war footing; or, what is equivalent, that there is no such thing as peace footings and war footings for naval establishments, he plants himself on a position where I decline to attempt to convince.

Mr. WOOD. I do say, sir, that a ship of the United States Navy should never float outside of the navy-yard that is not in a condition for war. And I say, further, that if the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy send afloat upon the ocean ships that are unprepared for war, they are criminally neglectful of their rightful duty. I say the things are one and inseparable; that if a vessel is seaworthy she is sent to sea; if she is not seaworthy she should not be sent to sea, to become a coffin for our poor sailors. But when a vessel of the Navy bearing the stars and stripes, with such armament as she carries on board, goes out of port and leaves the American coast, she is in hourly danger of aggression. Why, sir, some of our vessels of the Navy are for weeks and weeks away without knowing the complications into which our country may be plunged in the meanwhile. In the Pacific Ocean and between this and the East Indies they might be for months without any intelligence from the United States.

Will you then, sir, make me believe that an American ship of war should not be prepared for any emergency? How could our Asiatic fleet, how could our fleets in distant waters, have known the precise condition of our negotiations lately with Spain, when we ourselves at the capital did not know when we went to bed but there would be a declaration of war before we got up in the morning? And the gentleman does the President and the Secretary of the Navy no credit when he would make us believe that they have been in the habit of sending the Navy to sea without preparation for any emergency. That is my answer.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I crave the gentleman's indulgence again. Can he not see that all of the vessels that are sent to sea in time of peace may be good and safe vessels, but that in the aggregate as a naval force, in amount it is by no means large enough for a war footing but ample for a peace footing? It is not that a single vessel is incomplete and unfit, but that peace means economy and smaller establishments, and that war means the expenditure of money and large establishments.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has changed his position entirely. If he means to declare that the same quantity of ships will not answer for a time of war that would in a time of peace; if he means to declare that the American Navy must be materially increased before we are able to cope with the maritime power of Europe, I agree with him. But he cannot make me believe that, whether in time of peace or war, in regard to any vessel as a war-vessel, not as one of the merchant marine—otherwise than that she must not only have safety of bottom to prevent her being submerged in the ocean like the Virginius, must not only have a sound hull and good rigging, but she must have an armament. And I shall attempt to show, if I have time here, that in my judgment we have an ample Navy to-day for the purposes of this country; and not only that, but that we have too much, if it is necessary to tax the people again in future to maintain it.

I believe, sir, by a proper distribution of the existing force that we have navy enough. Instead of taking your favorite commodores who are playing the courtier here to the White House, sending them upon a pleasant tea-party excursion to the Mediterranean Ocean, and to dance attendance at the courts of Europe to have themselves telegraphed back as being at this prince's ball and that royal fête, as has occurred within these two years back; instead of having playthings, a pleasant-weather Navy, used, like some of our revenue-cutters, for the purpose of excursions, you should have them really and in fact men-of-war, and then distribute them to our different squadrons where our various mercantile necessities may require their presence. The Mediterranean Ocean! A fleet there! How absurd! Sir, the American flag is driven from the Mediterranean Ocean; the American flag is seen there no more. The only trade with the Mediterranean is the trade between her fruit-ports and the port of New York; and that is now conducted in foreign bottoms. We have no interest now in the Mediterranean. Those nice summer and winter watering-places, Genoa, Nice, Civita Vecchia, Marseilles, and those delightful places where Americans and others spend their winter seasons, do not require a navy to protect their rights and their interests.

Now, sir, I say there is an improper distribution of the existing forces at our command. There is an extravagance on the part of the men who are undertaking to run your Navy Department, and who are utterly incapable of understanding practically the great interests over which they preside. I can show, taking the statement of the Secretary of the Navy made to this House in his annual report, now in my hand, that the appropriations which have been made are ample. I represent a constituency which beyond any other in the country requires protection for its commerce in foreign oceans. No representative from the city of New York will in my judgment do aught to detract from the necessary protection of American commerce in foreign waters. I am willing to vote not only this sixteen million dollars, but twenty-six or thirty-six millions if they should be necessary for that purpose. But I do not vote one dollar for unnecessary purposes, not one dollar to maintain a great establishment for the glorification of any man. I want the expenditures of this Government in all its departments brought down to the lowest minimum of economical possibility of expenditure. I want no more boasting to the people of this country that we are on the line of economy. I do not want to hold out to the people of this country the idea that we are reducing these estimates and reducing these expenditures twenty or forty or fifty millions of dollars, while we come in slyly with our appropriation bills and really increase them. Let us deal fairly with the people of the United States, and in my judgment they will willingly respond to any proper demands we may make.

The Secretary of the Navy in his annual report sent in here on the first day of the session tells us that he has 63 steamers, other than iron-clads and tugs, carrying 826 guns, and 29 sailing-vessels, carrying 322 guns, and 48 iron-clad vessels, carrying 125 guns, making altogether an aggregate of 165 naval vessels. Now, how many naval stations have we?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I would like the gentleman to state how many of the vessels enumerated by him are in commission, or in such a condition that it is possible to put them in commission, for any service whatever.

Mr. WOOD. Well, sir, we have heard that annually and regularly for five years past. As soon as the war closed we found ourselves burdened with an extraordinary number of vessels and we gave them away. The naval appropriations in the year 1865 amounted to $109,000,000. When the war was over in 1865, 1866, and 1867, we sat here to deliberate what we should do with our Navy, and we then did—what? We sold for a song what had cost us many millions of dollars. Every vessel sold, we were told, was unseaworthy, and the Navy Department has been disposing of old vessels every year since, some of them probably quite as good as required; and the Secretary says in his report that he has sold thirteen vessels since last year. Now the presumption is that he has at last weeded the Navy out until he has nothing left but what is necessary and useful. He scolds us over his own signature for asking him to revise his estimates; at least so it is reported in the newspapers of the day. The newspapers contain summaries of the replies of these gentlemen who are at the head of the Department to the called-for reduction of the estimates, and that of the Secretary of the Navy is given in full in this morning's papers. He says substantially, "Gentlemen, I cannot reduce my estimates, but remember, if I am forced to reduce them, you must take the responsibility, not me." That is the answer of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him again?

Mr. WOOD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I should like to be allowed to occupy a few minutes of this hour of mine myself, but I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I dislike to trespass on the courtesy of the gentleman, but while his remarks are very eloquent indeed, I have not discovered that he has answered the question I put to him. I simply desire that at the same time he gives the House information as to the number of vessels and guns now in the Navy, he should also state how many are stated by the Secretary to be in commission. Ships in commission constitute the real force of a navy, and not old hulls.

Mr. WOOD. In order to answer that it is necessary to state that the Secretary himself virtually determines what vessels shall go into commission; and if he determines that none but first-class vessels shall go into commission, he can exclude two-thirds, and the better part of the Navy itself. The gentleman may know, but I do not, precisely what vessels are now in commission; but I do know that the Secretary of the Navy tells us what he has done, and I believe he tells us the truth.

Now, I hope that I shall not be misunderstood. I do not believe there is any reduction in this bill. With the $4,000,000 already appropriated the appropriation for the Navy will amount to over twenty million dollars. Every year but one since 1866, and that was last year, we have appropriated for this object less than twenty million dollars. Now, in my judgment, with a proper distribution of the existing force, what we propose to appropriate in this bill is not only sufficient but capable of further reduction. Sir, the whole expenditures of this Government must come down. [Cries of "O, no!"]

In my judgment everything connected with our Government is conducted at an extravagant, ay, a profligate expenditure. The people, I am told—I do not believe all I hear—have demanded that members of Congress shall come down. They have complained because the last Congress voted what, in their judgment, they deemed a proper compensation for their services, and this House readily and hastily jumped at the conclusion that the people are right, and propose to go back to an economical basis so far as their own pay is concerned.

Wages, expenditures of every kind, throughout the whole United States, are in a state of reduction. We have, in New York City, a hundred thousand men to-day who cannot get work at any price. I have had men come to my house in this town, since I have been here, willing to work for fifty cents a day. The necessities, the absolute necessities, of a large portion of the people cry for economy.

Now, why should not the Government itself come down a little? Why should we continue to maintain, as we do propose to maintain, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, the full expenditure for the Navy Department? I am in favor of reducing at every point, of paring down every dollar, and not expending yearly over $300,000,000 to run this machine. I believe we can reduce this without injuring the efficiency of the Navy.

My eloquent friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] is afraid of a foreign war, and wants to keep the Navy up to his exalted standard. The history of our country shows that no war can come too precipitately for the American people not to be prepared for the emergency. But a few years ago we improvised armies overnight to preserve the integrity of the Union. We can improvise a navy in three weeks, yes, in two weeks, which in my judgment will be able to compete with any nation in Europe, much more Spain. I believe that with the money that we would have for that purpose, which would be freely appropriated by Congress, we can command the finest ships of the world, whether of American or foreign bottoms, for our naval marine and for naval purposes. Almost with telegraphic speed could we obtain the best iron-clads of the world sufficient to produce the finest navy in the world. When that evil day comes, then, and not till then, let us make preparation for it. When it does come, I will stand by my friend from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] in voting as large an expenditure as his exalted idea of what the Navy should be may require. But in times like these, with want and hardship pressing upon the people, with a Treasury bankrupt, with a Secretary demanding to lay additional burdens at this particular juncture, I say it is madness, it is worse than folly, for us to attempt to continue an expenditure not called for by the necessities of the country.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I propose to move that the committee rise. But before doing so I desire to say that the Committee of the Whole has started out with an important bill, involving reductions. Of the positions that have been taken by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] not a single one of them is borne out by the facts and figures. Before this debate closes I will more at length show the disingenuousness of his position in attempting to show that the $4,000,000 appropriated by the emergency bill should be counted for the regular naval establishment.

In the mean time allow me to say that I hope there are few or no gentlemen on this side of the House that will oppose this bill in the interests of economy and reduction. Thus far all the friction and opposition come from the other side. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] an old and distinguished democratic member of this House, fights this bill to the knife because it does not give enough. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] sensitive because the Committee on Appropriations, and perhaps the republican party, has initiated a day of retrenchment, fights this bill to the death because it does not reduce enough. I will not take more time of the House now, but turn these gentlemen over to each other. Let the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ARCHER] answer the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] and the gentleman from New York answer the gentleman from Maryland.

> And as for me I care not a toss-up
> Whether Mossop whip Barry or Barry whip Mossop.

Mr. RANDALL. You can judge by our votes whether we are in favor of economy or not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. E. H. ROBERTS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being House bill No. 1013, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolutions thereon.

STEAM-BOILER EXPLOSIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In compliance with the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to authorize inquiries into the causes of steam-boiler explosions," I directed the Secretaries of the Treasury and Navy Department to create a commission to conduct the experiments and collect the information contemplated by the act. Such a commission was created, and I have the honor to submit herewith a report of the result of their labors to the present time.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 8, 1874.

The message, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REFORM SCHOOL IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to a deficiency in the appropriation for the erection of buildings for the reform school of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ATKINS: A petition of citizens of Henry County, Tennessee, praying the establishment of certain postal routes.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 9, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MORTON. If there are no Senators desiring to hear the minutes, I suggest that the reading be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the reading is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, asking an amendment to the act of March 3, 1873, in relation to the growth of timber on the prairies; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of Jacob Dunnell and others, citizens of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, asking for a modification of, and remonstrating against the repeal of, the bankrupt act. I recognize among the signers of this memorial many of the first business men of that very enterprising and flourishing community. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I also present the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Providence, asking that Congress may so amend the bankrupt law that an application of creditors holding in amount one-fourth of the whole indebtedness shall be required as a condition of forcing a debtor into bankruptcy; also, the substitution of salaries to officers of the court, instead of fees as now charged; also, uniformity of exemptions of property of bankrupts in the several States, and the enlargement of the power of the assignee, with the right on the part of the creditors to authorize compromises with debtors, and to direct the sale of the property for such account and to make distribution. I believe this memorial was adopted unanimously, and these suggestions come from gentlemen who are eminently entitled to be heard upon this subject. I move that the memorial lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Henry F. Ferrin, Seth G. Robbins, and other members of the Temple of Honor and Temperance of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of James H. Webb and other citizens of Maryland, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I also present a memorial largely signed by business men of Baltimore, remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the bankrupt law, and asking an amendment of the same; and also the petition of Ulman & Co. of the same city, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law. I move that these memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hold in my hand the petition of Mrs. Sarah Parker, with accompanying papers, praying to be allowed a pension for the reasons therein stated. I ask the careful, and I hope favorable, consideration of the Committee on Pensions to it. I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of a large number of citizens of Boonville, Oneida County, in the State of New York, of various professions and trades, asking for the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the proceedings of the Board of Trade of the city of Buffalo, New York, setting forth that, under rulings of the Treasury Department, canal-boats are held to be subject to the act of 1793, touching coasting licenses; setting forth that these boats ply—those in which this board is interested—on the various canals of the State of New York; and that although the district courts, as they understand them, held that such boats were not subject to the coasting act, they are continually seized still at various places, which they indicate; and they ask that the coasting act be so amended as to carry out what they believe to be its original intention, which was, giving no application of its provisions whatever to boats changing ownership from year to year and from month to month, and sailing under different masters, or, rather, being towed by horses mainly under different masters, on the canals of the State. I think this is a subject which ought to receive attention, and I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce, in the hope that all the members of that committee will give it an early supervision.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Charles B. Signor, praying for a pension on account of the causeless shooting away of his right arm by a soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the papers may be withdrawn, copies being retained on the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, it was

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of J. Gillingham Fell, George Burnham, and Edward Hoopes, trustees of the Walnut Grove Gold Mining Company, praying compensation for depredations committed by Indians in Arizona, have instructed me to report that whatever amount of compensation be due to these parties should not be paid out of the Treasury, but out of the annuities due to the Indians committing such depredations, if such annuities there be. The reasons for this conclusion are embodied in a written report, and the recommendation of the committee is that this memorial, with the written report, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the Committee on Claims discharged from its further consideration.

The report was ordered to be printed; and the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial, and it was referred, with the report, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRE-EMPTION SETTLERS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 21) for the relief of aged or infirm pre-emption settlers, have instructed me to report the same back with an amendment, and I desire the present consideration of the bill, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that in cases where sickness, infirmity, or great age renders it difficult for pre-emption claimants to attend before the local land-offices to make affidavits in pre-emption cases, such affidavits may be made before any officer authorized to administer oaths, and, on being filed in the land-office, shall have the same force and effect as if taken by the officers thereof; and effect is to be given to the act by regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land-Office.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was, in line 6, after the word "officer," to insert "of the district," so as to read: "such affidavits may be made before any officer of the district authorized to administer oaths," &c.

Mr. SARGENT. I would suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it should read "land-district," not "district," which is an indefinite term.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well; I do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified, and the question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLORADO LEGISLATIVE EXPENSES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory, to report it back and to ask for its present consideration, as there is a necessity for its prompt passage.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which appropriates $20,000 for compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory, and for pay of clerks, officers, and contingent expenses thereof.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state that that Legislature is in session, and that there was no appropriation made last year to pay its current expenses. This is for the ordinary and current expenses. This difficulty arises from the omission on the part of the secretary of that Territory to make his annual requisition, and so no appropriation was made last year. This is to supply an ordinary appropriation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have received a number of applications, and I suppose other Senators have, for copies of the bankrupt bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and more than I am able to supply. As one of the objects of letting that bill lie was to invite to it the consideration and criticism of the legal profession throughout the country, I think we ought to have enough copies to supply the requests that are made to us for that bill. I move therefore that one thousand extra copies of that bill be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing, unless there be unanimous consent to its present consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. The Clerk will please reduce my motion to writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that one thousand extra copies of the bankrupt bill be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. A Senator suggests fifteen hundred copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that fifteen hundred copies of the bankrupt bill be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 266) for the protection of society in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 267) to aid in the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 268) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Champion; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENNIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 270) making provisions for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 271) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of John M. Robinson, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF BONDS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up a bill reported from the Committee on Finance, with a view to its passage. I think it will take but a few minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill?

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 147) authorizing national banks that have decided to reduce their capital stock to withdraw a proportion of bonds upon retiring their own circulating notes, or depositing lawful money of the United States in the proportion provided by law."

Mr. CONKLING. Is that the same bill that was up heretofore?

Mr. MORTON. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I am against it.

Mr. SUMNER. I observe that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is not in his seat.

Mr. MORTON. It is only a small bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SUMNER. I think we ought not to proceed with it in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. [Mr. SHERMAN entered the Chamber.] There he is now. I ask the Senator from Ohio to take notice of the bill proposed to be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. That bill is all right.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. I saw the Senator was out of his seat, and merely stated the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a bill that was debated here for a day or two.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it the same bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; only a part of it.

Mr. CONKLING. If it is the same bill, I am opposed to it.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have the bill read, as reported by the committee, with amendments.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, if amended as proposed by the Committee on Finance, will read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any banking association that may decide to reduce its capital stock, as provided in the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be entitled to take up a pro rata portion of its bonds, upon depositing lawful money of the United States, or returning its own circulating notes in the proportion required by law; and whenever such reduction shall be authorized under said section, any notes of such bank thereafter coming into the Treasury of the United States shall be canceled until the amount so canceled, together with such as shall be redeemed, shall equal the amount of reduction authorized.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORTON. I will state that this bill is designed to remedy an omission in the law. The law now provides that where a bank retires its circulation altogether, it can do so by depositing an equal amount of legal-tender notes in the Treasury; but there is no provision that authorizes a bank which proposes to reduce its circulation in part to deposit legal-tender notes.

Mr. CONKLING. Not $10,000?

Mr. MORTON. No; it has nothing to do with that at all. If a bank having $100,000 circulation proposes to retire its circulation, it may do so without depositing its own notes, by depositing an equal amount of legal-tender notes—greenbacks; but if it proposes to retire only $50,000 of its circulation, as the law now stands it must furnish its own notes, and it may be impossible to collect them. I simply propose to extend to the bank the same right, where it proposes to retire only a part of its circulation, that it would have if it proposed to retire the whole of it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from Indiana if the effect of this bill is not to render it much more easy for a bank to contract its circulation, and thus produce a contraction in the currency of the country? It may be a very desirable measure; but it does not occur to me that it is a measure of such little importance as the Senator from Indiana would indicate. As I understand it now a bank, for the privileges of banking under our law, has a certain circulation which it is bound to take care of, which is a great advantage to the country. This bill enables them to reduce that circulation while they retain all the privileges of banking, if I understand it. It seems to me that that may lead to a very decided contraction of the currency of the country.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, this subject was before the Senate a few days ago because of the addition to another bill of the provisions in substance of this bill; and the objection which the Senator from New Jersey now makes was then partially considered, and was also considered in committee in reporting this bill. Having reported this bill and paid some attention to it, I will state briefly the difference between the provision which was in that bill then considered and this bill as now reported.

The bill which was then considered authorized national banks to make successive reductions, of $10,000 at each time, of their circulating medium by depositing in the Treasury legal-tender notes instead of redeeming their own circulation. There was no reference in that bill to the section of the national-currency act under which the reduction of capital was authorized; but in the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana there is a reference to the thirteenth section of the currency act, under which these reductions were previously authorized; and the difference between the original act and this modification of it is, that now, instead of returning their own notes and lifting the bonds, they are authorized to return legal-tender notes to the amount which they propose to reduce their capital, and lift their bonds. The section, however, under which they are now required to make this application prohibits them from reducing their capital below the minimum amount authorized in the national-currency act, whereas the bill under consideration a few days ago had no such prohibition; and the effect of that provision would have been to enable a national bank, by successive reductions of $10,000 each, absolutely to go into liquidation, or reduce its capital below the minimum amount and still continue business.

Now, by depositing any amount to which they propose to reduce their capital, not going below the minimum authorized by the national-currency act, they are permitted to contract their circulation to that extent. But the objection which was then made—and I think I made it myself—was, that it might contract the currency, because, these legal-tender notes being deposited in place of a specific security which had been retained in the Treasury for the redemption of the bank-notes, it might be held that there could be no reissue of those legal-tender notes; and that would to that extent have been a contraction of the currency. But upon an examination of the successive acts relating to the issue of legal-tender notes, I am entirely satisfied that the notes thus deposited by a bank in lieu of its own circulating notes may be reissued. Therefore the objection which the Senator from New Jersey makes does not apply—that it would be, to the extent of the reduction of capital, a contraction of the currency. The national-bank notes would still be in circulation until redeemed. When redeemed they can again be awarded to that portion of the country which would be entitled to them under the provisions of the national-currency act.

I believe this answers the point made by the Senator from New Jersey, unless I have failed to apprehend his whole point.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It does answer the objection I made. I only see this effect to the bill now—that it would produce a contraction, perhaps, in one part of the country, but a corresponding advantage, by reissuing these notes, to another part of the country. I suppose that would be the effect of the bill. Some of the Southern States, too, that have not their due proportion of circulation, would probably by this act get circulation which is now in New York and in the Eastern and Middle States.

Mr. SCOTT. This circulation would again have to be apportioned by the Comptroller of the Currency to that portion of the country which, under the provisions of the existing law, would be entitled to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question with reference to this circulation. What is the custom or rule in the office of the Comptroller with reference to the redistribution of this currency? I understood the chairman of the Committee on Finance, when this question was up before, to state that brokers were in the habit of paying as high as 3, 4, or 5 per cent. for this currency with a view of establishing new banks. It seems to me hardly fair that bankers should be permitted to deposit legal-tender notes in the Treasury, still leaving out the circulation of their banks, and thus permitting brokers and others to buy up this circulation at 3, 4, or 5 per cent. premium, with a view of establishing new banks. It seems to me that if a bank desires to surrender its circulation, it ought to be compelled to surrender its own notes and withdraw its bonds, or else it ought to be required to deposit such premium in addition to the legal-tender notes as will induce the holders of its own notes to return them to the Treasury, so that if this redemption of national-bank notes is to be made at the Treasury some inducement should be held out for the return of the notes of banks in liquidation or such banks as desire to retire their circulation. It seems to me there ought to be some provision so as to take these national-bank notes ont of the hands of brokers who are in the habit of paying, as the chairman informed us the other day, from 3 to 5 per cent. for them.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Iowa direct his attention to the amendment which the committee has added to the bill as originally introduced, which to a certain extent and to a considerable extent will obviate that objection. It requires that whenever any of the notes of such bank shall, after the reduction is authorized, come into the Treasury in any manner, it shall at once be the duty of the officers of the Treasury to cancel those notes until such cancellation, together with the redemption that they are authorized to make, shall equal the amount of reduction authorized.

Mr. ALLISON. That, of course, will remedy the evil to some extent; but I think it is a bad practice to have these banks placing legal-tender notes in the Treasury and withdrawing their bonds, still leaving their own notes in circulation to be picked up by brokers with a view of establishing new banks in particular favored localities. It seems to me that if legal-tender notes are returned to the Treasury, there ought to be some inducement held out whereby these circulating notes will be sent into the Treasury for redemption, and new banks may then be formed under such rules as the Comptroller of the Currency may establish, without reference to the brokers.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal of force in the suggestion just made by the Senator from Iowa; but I rise now to submit another question to the Senator from Pennsylvania. He argues, as I understand him, that contraction will not be a result flowing from the adoption of this proposition, because, although a bank might decide to reduce its capital and would wish to reduce its circulation, and therefore might deposit in the Treasury $10,000 or $50,000 of legal-tender notes, yet the Treasury would have authority to reissue those notes, and therefore there would be no contraction of circulation. That I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say. I wish to ask him how the Secretary of the Treasury is going to reissue those notes; on what account is he going to reissue them; what opportunity will the Secretary of the Treasury have to reissue those notes; whom shall he issue them to, and what for?

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer the gentleman from Wisconsin by reference to the provisions of the acts of February 25, 1862, July 11, 1862, and March 3, 1863; the concluding provision of the act of March 3, 1863, being:

And any of the said notes, when returned to the Treasury, may be reissued from time to time, as the exigencies of the public service may require.

Then follows this provision:

And in lieu of said notes, or any other United States notes returned to the Treasury and canceled or destroyed, there may be issued equal amounts of United States notes such as are authorized by this act.

That latter provision, however, does not apply to the specific case which we now have under consideration; but any of the notes authorized by any of these acts are authorized to be reissued by the Treasury Department for any of the purposes of the Government. It was my objection to the bill heretofore under consideration that these notes being deposited in lieu of bonds specifically deposited as security for circulating notes, it might be held that these notes should be retained in the same specific manner; but upon examination of the various acts I find the language so broad that I have no doubt of the power of the Treasury to reissue these notes for any purposes that they may find the exigencies of the Government require, for the payment of any demands against the Government.

Mr. HOWE. Conceding that they might be issued to meet any exigency, the question which I put to the Senator is, how is it possible that such an exigency could arise? The Treasury can only pay money upon an appropriation, and to meet every appropriation you are supposed to collect a tax. Now, when the Treasurer holds in one hand from taxes the money to meet every appropriation which he is required to satisfy out of the other, I do not see just where it is going to bring in these legal-tenders.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that when these legal-tenders are deposited in the Treasury for this purpose they are there to be paid out for the current expenditures of the Government in any way, just as if they had been collected in the way of revenue and taxation, unless there is some prohibition of law that would prevent legal-tenders paid in in that way from being so paid out. They are there for any use for which we may have money, and they would save, if they were there now, so much of the forty-four million reserve.

Mr. HOWE. Ah, yes; here would have been an exigency; the first one we have seen since the forty-four million reserve came into existence. The Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] reminds me that my memory is failing; that there was an exigency just like this, a first cousin to it, in 1872. I had entirely forgotten that. I had not known of an instance in which any part of the forty-four million reserve had been issued up to this time. The Senator from New York, reminds me that two years ago $7,000,000 of the forty-four million reserve were issued.

Mr. FENTON. Four million dollars. It was in October, 1872, just prior to the election in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

Mr. HOWE. I had forgotten the fact.

Mr. SHERMAN. That issue of a portion of the forty-four million reserve a year or more ago led to the controversy which gave rise to the report of the Committee on Finance last winter on the subject.

Mr. HOWE. Then there have been two such exigencies; but I think, unless we improve our legislation in that direction, they will not occur often enough to prevent this working a contraction.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator it does not require an exigency. When this money is paid in, it is there to be paid out in the way of ordinary expenditure like every other money in the Treasury, unless you pass some law preventing it.

Mr. HOWE. I understood that from the Senator from Pennsylvania; but what I wish to call the attention of the Senator to is, that for all those ordinary expenses you have other money in the Treasury derived from taxes; and now if the Bank of Commerce puts one million or three millions into the Treasury to be used by and by to retire its notes, and taxes supply the same three millions, then you have six millions to meet three millions of liabilities; there are three millions more than you want, whatever that is. I do not see how those three millions are going to get out except by retaining three millions derived from another source.

Mr. SCOTT. The point the Senator from Wisconsin makes is one well worthy of consideration. It is renewing in another form the same objection which I had to the bill which was previously considered; and, to get it down to the finest point, it is simply this: that when, for instance, $10,000 of legal-tender notes are paid into the Treasury in lieu of circulating notes for the purpose of reducing the capital of a bank, those notes will have to be covered into the Treasury formally before they can again be used by the Treasury Department in payment of any expenses of the Government. That is the point which the Senator makes.

Mr. HOWE. Not exactly that point. I think they ought to be covered into the Treasury and be held there as a fund dedicated to a specific purpose, to wit, the cancellation of the bank-notes when they come in. But whether that is so or not, the consequence is the same. You have got twice the amount of money in the Treasury that you need for the legitimate purposes of the Treasury. The taxes supply all the money you want for ordinary purposes; and yet they will tell you you may use this money which the banks pay in for those purposes. Suppose you do; you have then the same amount locked up in the Treasury derived from contraction—and that is a contraction beyond all question.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have no doubt that the Senator from Wisconsin is right when he speaks of this measure as being a contraction; but it appears to me that it is not objectionable on that account, for if it is a contraction, it is a contraction made necessary because those who are interested in finances have no occasion for the money which they return. It is to be those instances of contraction where the necessities of commerce do not demand the amount of currency which is in circulation. Therefore, on that account, I do not see the objection to it.

Mr. HOWE. Well, Mr. President, that is a very ingenious and very manifest—fair in one sense—justification of this contraction. To-day your banking system amounts to just this, and no more: that the United States shares with bankers the profits of furnishing a circulating medium; the Government furnishing one half and the banks furnishing the other half, and the Government redeeming the whole. This proposition, as defined by the Senator from Connecticut—and I think he defines it accurately—amounts to this: that, in addition to all this, the Government proposes to borrow from the banks whatever surplus of circulation they may have from time to time. It is to become the sponge to absorb whatever surplus of circulation the banks may have, and pay them interest for it until, by and by, the community needs it again and will pay more for it than the Government pays. That is loading the Government beyond what I think ought to be done.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It seems to me perfectly right and reasonable, as I have said repeatedly before, when the Government is indebted and does not meet its obligations, if its creditors demand pay, that the Government should pay a consideration for holding off, or, rather, interest on its debt until it does pay it. So that the objection which the Senator from Wisconsin makes is not, to my mind, any serious objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I will take the liberty to say, in response to what has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin, that this bill, practically, does not work a contraction of the currency, nor an expansion. It does furnish, however, additional facilities for doing what upon the whole I think it is inexpedient to have done. A practice has grown up which possibly the Treasury Department might stop by what would be an exercise of arbitrary power. Persons desiring to organize a new bank, or to obtain additional circulation for a bank already in existence, purchase the issues of insolvent banks, or the issues of solvent banks, desiring to diminish their circulation, at a premium varying from 2 to 6 per cent. At present there must be deposited for the redemption of the issues of insolvent banks United States notes; for the redemption of the issues of solvent banks, or for the decrease of the circulation of solvent banks, the issues of the particular banks. This bill proposes that solvent banks may diminish their circulation by a deposit of United States notes. Of course this facilitates the process of diminishing the issues of solvent banks, and increases the facility for transferring the circulation of solvent banks to other banks, or to banks to be organized.

There is vested in the Treasury Department a general discretion within the law as to the place where additional circulation shall be supplied. But when parties desiring a new bank, or desiring to add to the circulation of an existing bank, have made arrangements through brokers for the circulation of insolvent banks, or with the officers of solvent banks that desire to diminish their circulation, it is difficult for the officers of the Treasury Department to say that that particular transaction shall not be completed, although, as will be seen, it takes from the Treasury Department its discretion to decide where the new circulation shall be placed.

I think it is better when the circulation is to be transferred from existing solvent institutions, or from insolvent institutions, to new localities, that it should be left to the Treasury Department rather than to individuals outside; and in so far as that is wise, this bill is unwise, inasmuch as it increases the facility for doing that particular thing.

I will take this occasion, Mr. President—not in reply to the Senator from Connecticut, but in consequence of a suggestion made by the Senator from Connecticut—to submit an observation touching an opinion that seems to be pretty common, which is that the Government of the United States has a vast amount of its demand notes in circulation and discredited by not being redeemed when once due. Whoever will look at a United States note will see that there is no obligation expressed—and I think none implied—in what is written upon the note, that it is to be paid at a particular time. It is redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, but not payable at any particular moment. Such was the spirit of the law. Such, I think, has been the view of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator that the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision delivered by the Chief Justice, decided that those notes were not payable on demand, and that the Government was not bound to pay any part of them until it was ready to redeem the whole currency.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Undoubtedly. I do not see how the court could have decided otherwise, inasmuch as there was nothing in the law implying that the notes were to be redeemed at a particular time; and there was nothing expressed or implied upon the face of the notes that they were to be redeemed at a particular time. The Government in reference to all these issues stands precisely as it does in reference to the five-twenty bonds, with the exception that there is no period of time assigned when the notes are to be paid. The five-twenty bonds are redeemable in five years, but they are not payable until twenty years. As regards the United States notes they are redeemable at any time, but they are payable only at the pleasure of the Government; that is to say, the Government will consult its own convenience—the ideas that prevail as to a wise public policy. I only make these remarks that I may put an end, so far as an expression of opinion can put an end, to the opinion prevailing in the community that the Government has for a moment been discredited in the reference or the redemption of these notes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to put a question to the Senator, before he takes his seat, in relation to the point which he has suggested. If an individual were to give a note, with no time specified as to date of payment—a promise to pay five dollars or ten dollars—will he say as a lawyer that any court would not enforce payment on demand?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will answer that, according to my ideas, the relations between individuals are determined by the laws. I suppose the courts would enforce the payment of a similar private obligation after the demand was made, considering the circumstances, whether they were reasonable or not; but the rule does not apply to the Government. There is no power of making the demand. These notes were issued upon an express and general notice as to the character of the obligation, and discretion as to the time of payment is left with the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then the only difference is that an individual cannot sue the Government. If the claim existed against another citizen of course it could be enforced; but this claim being a promise made by the Government, which cannot be sued by an individual, therefore it stands upon a different basis.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to suggest that the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon that very point, holding that these notes were not in their nature, and were not understood to be, payable upon demand, but at the convenience of the Government?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am quite ready to admit that there is no obligation which can be enforced by law; but it does not destroy the moral obligation.

Mr. SCOTT. Recurring to a point which bears upon the bill under consideration, I wish to get from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] a distinct understanding as to an impression which I think he has left upon my mind, although he may not have left it upon the minds of others, and which I think may do injury to the country. It is this: that where those interested in an insolvent bank make an arrangement with others to buy up their circulation, or where those who wish to decrease their capital and diminish their circulation make an arrangement with brokers and others to buy up their circulation and give it to banks already established, or to new banks to be established, the Treasury officers feel bound by that arrangement to give their sanction to it and to permit that circulation to go to the banks that have thus arranged for it. If such an arrangement has been made, either by an insolvent bank or by a solvent bank, is there anything in the national-currency act which prevents the Comptroller of the Currency from apportioning that circulation, according to the population or wealth, under the terms of that act; and if the Comptroller refuses to persons having purchased the circulation his sanction to the arrangement which they have made, can they do anything more than present the notes at the Treasury and have them redeemed?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator is quite right as to the powers of the Treasury Department; and I may say that while, ordinarily at least, four or five years since, as far as I know, there were no regulations existing in the Treasury Department by which this business was controlled, yet about a year and a half or two years since certain regulations were made designed to limit this business in such a manner as to make the organization of new banks concur with the general policy of the law. But it is with difficulty that it can be done. When respectable parties have obtained the currency and paid for it, and are ready to organize a new bank, unless there is some special reason adverse to the plan which they have, it is difficult for the Treasury Department to say that that bank shall not be organized in that particular place; and yet if the question were submitted to the Treasury Department originally, without any influences at work, the opinion might be different. I do not speak of it as a great evil; but this bill facilitates that business undoubtedly.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to read an extract from the opinion of the court on the very point?

Mr. HOWE. Yes; let us hear it.

Mr. MORTON. It is in the case of Bank vs. Supervisors, (7 Wallace, 29:)

> Under the exigencies of the times it seems to have been thought inexpedient to attempt any provision for the redemption of United States notes in coin. The law, therefore, directed that they should be made payable to bearer at the Treasury of the United States, but did not provide for payment on demand. The period of payment was left to be determined by the public exigencies.

And there is more to the same effect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was a little surprised by the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, undertaking to defend, as it seemed to me, the morality of issuing Government paper without any specified time for payment, and claiming therefore that legally, as well as morally—for it must be so understood—it had the right to postpone the day of payment forever. Now, sir, without pretending to understand very much of the niceties of law, I know as a business man that in case any individual were to give his paper out in this form with no time specified as to when it should be paid, if, on demand, the party issuing the paper did not pay it, the courts would decide that he should pay, and that it was a fraud to evade the payment of it. Now I do not like to place the Government of the United States in that position. I believe that it was the intention from the first to pay this paper at a very early moment. When it was first issued there was a special provision that it should be redeemed, and bonds were authorized in lieu of the paper issued. Subsequently that part of the law was repealed, but the form of the obligation was not changed.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, touching this question of the meaning of the promise which is inscribed on your greenback, I think if I were sitting as a justice of the peace or as a judge in the Court of Claims, I should say precisely what the Supreme Court said in the case which has been referred to. I would not give judgment against the United States upon one of these notes. But because your law was so framed as not to make a contract upon which individuals could sue, as not to make a contract upon which a court could give judgment, it does not follow that we are exempted from the obligation to give judgment for the payment of these notes whenever the United States is able to meet the obligation of that contract.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me a word?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I take no issue with the Senator from Wisconsin or with the Senator from Vermont as to the obligation of the country, at the earliest possible moment, to make all these notes equivalent in value to specie and to redeem them. But I have yet to learn how the public credit is improved or the character of the country increased by the statement that it is living in constant financial dishonor. I said what I did simply for the purpose of bringing before the Senate what I understood to be the law, because nations act upon the law. The equity and the morality are to be sought for in the hearts and the purposes of the people; but a nation cannot be charged with dishonor when it has stipulated beforehand what it will do and is in the direction, as it has been for the last five or six years, of performing what it has undertaken ultimately to do; and that is, to make these notes of the value of coin and redeemable in coin. But while this process is going on, and while we are under no obligation to bring the process to an ultimate and favorable result at a particular time, I do not hold the nation to be discredited or dishonored if it be acting in good faith towards a result which it has promised ultimately to perform, but which it has not agreed to perform at a particular time.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has made one admission, and it covers about all that I insist upon with reference to the character of the greenback. He has accompanied it by a statement which remains to be verified, and that is, that for five or six years the Government has been in the direction of making your deferred promises equal in value to coin; what you promised to do when you put them afloat. That business has been in that direction I think is correct; that the Government has taken a step in that direction I have yet to learn. Something has been accomplished, the Senator suggests. Yes, by business, and in spite of the Government; not by the Government. That is my understanding of the case in reference to the greenbacks.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the salary bill, so called.

Mr. LEWIS. If in order, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will withdraw that, and let us get rid of this one bill that is before us. If we do that to-day, I shall have no objection to adjourning over to-morrow.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 28, noes 23.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. MORTON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 29; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City, and a bill (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George M. Richards, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $881.29 for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

OFFICIAL SALARIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 793) to establish the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "repealed," in line 13, the words:

And the reduction of salaries herein provided for shall take effect as of the 4th day of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall compute the same accordingly, and shall make ratable monthly deductions from said salaries at the rate necessary to effectuate this provision within nine months next hereafter.

So as to read:

And the salaries and compensation of all said officers and clerks of every name and description shall be and remain as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of the act the provisions of which are hereby repealed. And the reduction of salaries herein provided for shall take effect, &c.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I think it was unfortunate for the bill under consideration that the Senate last evening concluded to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON.] I think it was unfortunate that the Senator from Iowa who had charge of this bill [Mr. WRIGHT] thought proper to depart from the rule, which he had announced throughout the debate, of voting down all amendments, for fear they might retard or prevent the passage of the bill, to vote for that amendment simply because in some of its terms it resembled a bill which he had himself introduced on the first day of the session.

Now, sir, I very strongly desire to vote for this bill. Certainly a very serious doubt exists in my mind at the present time whether or not I shall vote for the bill if this feature is retained in it; and I speak not merely for myself, but think that I express the opinion of other Senators. The amendment already adopted singles out the President of the United States alone, separates him from the Supreme Court judges, from every other officer, and puts him in a pillory for four years; nails his ears to a post, to be the object of all the attacks, of all the slang, which malignity and genius combined can invent to throw at his devoted head. This amendment does not provide that the increased salary of the President and of the supreme judges shall cease after the expiration of the present term of the incumbents of these positions, placing him in company with the supreme judges, so that any reflection cast upon him must be shared by others, and therein, perhaps, their injustice be shown. But the amendment says that this repealing act shall take effect as to the President from the termination of the presidential term, and then goes on to say that the repeal shall not now, nor then, nor at any time, take effect on the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I wish to know if that is the purpose of the American Senate. I wish to know if it is our purpose that the President of the United States from now until his term expires shall be the object of attacks which this gives fertile occasion for. If we intend covertly and cunningly by this provision that the President shall not, on account of a public opinion that shall be aroused against him if he should take the increased pay for three or four years, get what the law allows, then I say it is unworthy of us as legislators thus to avoid, thus to endeavor to circumvent, the constitutional provision. But if that is not our purpose, we at any rate put the President in such a position that he is compelled to forego one-half the pay which is his by the Constitution, or else plead what will be alleged as a mere constitutional technicality in order to receive this increased pay. We put him in a position where papers with little character, and papers, perhaps, with greater, may be able to say each quarter as he goes to the Treasury and draws the enhanced compensation, "The thief has been once more to the Treasury and carried off double the amount to which he was equitably entitled;" double the amount because the Congress of the United States has said that he ought to have only one-half that amount in effect, by saying that his successor should only have one-half that amount and his predecessors had but one-half.

Now I am unwilling as a Senator, and I am unwilling as a republican Senator most certainly, to put the President of the United States, and again I say the President chosen by the party to which I belong, in the position of being an object of the abuse that can be heaped upon him by the reckless papers of the United States. I do not characterize them all by that term; but Senators know to what I refer, and know that there are papers of this description which will gladly seize upon this or any other occasion to besmirch the fair reputation of the President of the United States, and we by this amendment provide that he alone, and simply because he is shielded by what they well declare is a constitutional technicality, shall retain his increased compensation and his successor shall not have it. I ask, can this as it stands, singling him out from the Supreme Court judges of the United States, bear any other construction, and does it not make the President a mark for the arrows of abuse during the remainder of his term?

The Senator from Iowa, when this amendment was proposed, varying the terms of the bill, arose and said that it was necessary for him to vote for this because he had introduced it, or something like it, at the commencement of the session. I can forgive a good deal to pride of authorship; but it seems to me that there was another obligation, which I wish to suggest kindly to the Senator, and that was to stand by the committee, to stand by the bill he reported, and that obligation he recognized when on two several occasions, when the Senator from Indiana had brought forward amendments making this retroactive to the 4th of March, he said, "Well, this is right; if it were a separate proposition, or came in at such a time that it would not injure the bill, I would vote for it; but I call upon the Senate to vote down these amendments even if they be right, and I believe they are right; otherwise the passage of the bill will be endangered." But when comes that amendment so injurious to the President of the United States, injurious to the reputation of the President of the United States, then all this solicitude for the bill seems to vanish in the face of the pride of authorship.

I tell the gentleman that his bill is in more danger to-day, and on account of that course of his own, than it would be by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, or almost any other amendment that can be proposed. And why? Because there is a spirit of fair play in the Senate and Congress, because we do not want to see the President of the United States the object of the assaults of ruffianism all over the country; we do not want by indirection to circumvent the President of the United States; we do not want to unconstitutionally prevent his receiving the compensation which was provided before his term commenced; we do not want to inflict that injustice on him. It is the sense of fair play of the Senate that I rely upon. I know the amendment was adopted without much debate. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] called attention to it in a few remarks; but I doubt if it was generally understood, and I doubt if the Senator from Iowa himself understood that the amendment singled out the President and separated him from the judges of the Supreme Court, and said the repeal should take place at the end of his term, and the repeal should not take place at the end of their term, whereby they would have shared the responsibility with him of taking the pay which the Constitution and our laws have provided they shall receive.

Now, sir, as I voted in the negative on this proposition, I am not in a position to move a reconsideration of it; but it seems to me that the matter is grave enough for some Senator who did vote in the affirmative to move a reconsidertion of the amendment. I trust it will be done.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, just one word. I have had no personal or hostile feeling in my action on this question in proposing the amendment which the Senate has agreed to; and it is really the proposition of my honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and was first introduced in this body by him. It was offered by me because it met my views, and was what I believed the fair sentiment of the country required. So far as I am concerned everybody knows that I am a democrat, and a very decided one; but in any amendment that I proposed on this question I had no idea of reflecting, nor does the amendment itself reflect at all, upon the President of the United States. It is the only time we can have the opportunity of determining this question.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me? I should like to ask if there is not an opportunity at any time during the next three years to pass a provision of this character which will not reflect upon the President of the United States? I would further ask if, when he is separated from the judges, and it is said that he shall receive the increased salary only during his term, that is not a reflection on him? Is it not an indication of the sense of Congress that he ought not to have the enhanced amount, and consequently that he does wrong in taking it?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I think not. We may as well act upon it now, as it is before us, as any other time within the next three years. We have got to do it in order that it may be effective and apply to his successor. We are to do it during his period of service. It would be just as much a reflection, and more so, if we made the provision just as he was going out of office. If I know the character of President Grant, if I understand him at all, he will care nothing about the action of this Congress, because he is not responsible for it and for our conduct here upon this subject. The law now provides that he shall have $50,000 a year. The Constitution of the United States says that he shall have it, and we cannot take it from him. I cannot blame the President for taking the $50,000. I do not blame anybody here for returning his $5,000 or keeping it. The argument of the honorable Senator from California would apply to our action on this bill, and he might as well say that by the repeal of this law we reflect upon every member of the Senate who has drawn the increased pay prior to the 3d of March, or what is commonly called the back pay. This legislation reflects as severely upon those gentlemen as it can possibly upon the President of the United States. There is no reflection upon either, in my judgment. I do not intend to reflect upon President Grant for taking the salary. It was his right to do it. We gave it to him as the representatives of the people, and, as the Executive officer of the Government, he signed the bill.

So far as I am concerned, in offering the amendment I designed no reflection upon anybody, and it reflects upon nobody. The amendment only does this: it carries out what I believe to be a fair expression of the public sentiment of the people of this country; and in the expression of that sentiment it has reference alone to the provisions of the bill, and to no individual that may have taken the advantage of it. But we are not to remain here and undertake to combat the suggestions of newspapers, or the criticisms of newspapers. It is their right to criticise the conduct of the President and to criticise our conduct, and it is their duty at times to do so. Are we to make laws to suit that criticism at all times, or are we to control and direct our legislation to avoid that criticism? I think the honorable Senator has not stated the question fairly. He says that he has observed that some newspapers are already making suggestions about the President of the United States—that he has already been the subject of abuse and criticism. Sir, members, too, have been subject to abuse and criticism. We cannot help that. We desire to do what is right; and I am sure I do not know that I can say so positively, but I am sure that, amidst all the newspaper criticism, and amid all the reflections that some people may cast upon the President of the United States if this measure shall pass both Houses of Congress, he is well able to stand it, and will stand it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise, Mr. President, to debate this amendment. It is perfectly well understood, and I suppose has been debated at sufficient length already. My single observation is, not that public opinion is for or against this refunding of the accruing pay during this time. I do not know that we are bound to know what public opinion is, and I do not know that we are bound to act upon it if we do know, because a public opinion that grows up suddenly may change as suddenly; and I believe that our terms were made long in order that we might not mistake that for a public opinion which at the moment seemed to be such. I offer the proposition now pending because I believe the passage of that clause in the appropriation bill relating to our salaries was wrong in itself—first, because it was attached to an appropriation bill; and, second, because we forced ourselves to pass it for the reason that we thought, either rightfully or wrongfully—I think wrongfully—that we could not vote it out of the appropriation bill, or direct our committee to insist upon taking it out, without defeating the whole bill. The bill having passed, either under a wrong interpretation of our rules, or, if under a right one, under a rigorous interpretation that prevented us from voting, as, presumably, we otherwise would, I think that such vicious legislation as that ought to be wiped off the statute-book and matters put in statu quo. The way to do that is to put this matter where it stood on the 3d of March, as far as we have the power to do so. Having done that, I shall be quite willing to face public opinion, when our affairs are in as good order as they were on the 3d of March last, by voting for a proper increase of the salaries of members of Congress, and other officers of the Government who seem to deserve it, to take effect in the future and not in the past. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am somewhat embarrassed as to my action on this bill. I had assured the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that if he would introduce a bill simply restoring the compensation of members of Congress and the employés of the two Houses to the exact position that was occupied by them before the passage of the bill of the 3d of March, 1873, I would stand by him and vote down with him every amendment offered, and I did stand by him and voted against amendments of which I was really in favor, because I considered myself bound in honor to do so. But when the Senator who had charge of the bill abandoned that position, I did not vote on the last proposition which was added to the bill. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that any other bill will become a law than the bill which I pledged myself to stand by with him. I do not believe that this bill in its present shape will become a law if we pass it through the Senate. Hence, as I said before, after the abandonment of the position taken by the honorable Senator having charge of the bill I felt myself very much embarrassed, and am still so. I should be very glad to vote for several of the amendments that I voted against because I considered myself bound not to vote for them. I hope the Senator from Iowa will reconsider his action and stand by his original proposition, and give us a bill that we are sure we can pass, which will restore matters precisely as they stood before the passage of the act of the 3d of March last.

Mr. BOREMAN. As I understand this amendment, it proposes to make the last amendment that was attached to the bill, so far as the employés and officers other than the President are concerned, to take effect from the 4th of March last, and it would withdraw from the officers and employés in effect, although not in terms, a portion of the salaries which they have already received. The Senate voted down a proposition like this applicable to the members of this body, and I apprehend they will not now attach to this bill and make applicable to other officers and employés a proposition which they would not impose upon themselves. It would be a singular course of legislation for us to say that a proposition of this sort was good for other officers, but was very inappropriate for Senators. I shall vote against it upon the same principle that I voted against the amendment yesterday, which was to make the law itself operative from the 4th of March, taking away a portion of the salaries, as I understood, of the members of this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from West Virginia I think misapprehends the scope of my amendment. It does not operate retroactively as to the officers and employés of the Senate and leave the Senators to have their back pay between this time and the 4th of March last. It provides for all that the law of the 3d of March provided for, excepting the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. BOREMAN. I should like to have the amendment reported again. I have misapprehended its terms, probably.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> And the reduction of salaries herein provided for shall take effect as of the 4th day of March, 1873; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall compute the same accordingly, and shall make ratable monthly reductions from said salaries at the rate necessary to effectuate this provision within nine months next hereafter.

Mr. BOREMAN. Then, Mr. President, it includes Senators and all other officers except the President and the judges, so that to that extent I have misapprehended it. It is the same proposition, however, only that it is broader, which we voted down yesterday. I trust this will also be voted down.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have nothing to say upon the amendment now pending; and what I may have to say upon the other question would hardly be appropriate at this time. When the question shall again come before the Senate touching the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, I may, perhaps, then make a response or answer to the very kindly and friendly lecture which has been read to me by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] Of course I recognize the right of that Senator and of others to question my action and my conduct here. Of course that Senator understands very much better than I do what should be my course of conduct in the control of a bill. Of course, by reason of his larger experience, he is able to tell much bettter than I can what is to be the effect of the bill, the amendment having been adopted which was adopted yesterday; and of course I should hardly be expected to question the correctness of the conclusion at which he has arrived. I think there is a very clear distinction, however, between the position I occupied yesterday upon the one amendment and the position I occupied upon another. It may arise from a mistake on my part, he understanding the subject involved very much better than I do. If I had believed when the amendment was offered that it would endanger the success of the bill, I should certainly have occupied the same position upon it that I did upon the other amendments. If I could be led to believe that, I certainly should occupy the same ground that I did before; for, as I have said on more than one occasion, what I want is results, and I do not care to wrangle and quarrel and controvert over the matters intermediate or questions which may arise that do not affect such general results. I say if I believed the amendment would have the effect indicated by the Senator from California, and he doubtless understands it very much better than I do, I should certainly not insist on the amendment.

But it was not my purpose at this time to speak of the amendment adopted yesterday, for there is an amendment now pending before the Senate that raises an entirely different question. I will, however, now that I have the floor, say one thing. The Senator from California seems to intimate that I, by the amendment adopted yesterday, singled out the President of the United States. Does not that Senator know that the amendment of the Senator from Maryland includes other officers as well as the President of the United States? The question involved is simply this: whether we as Senators here will eat humble pie and confess that last March we were wrong in increasing our own salaries, but right in increasing the salary of everybody else. I am not prepared to do that.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator name the other officers?

Mr. WRIGHT. It increased the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury Department; it increased the Supervising Architect of the Treasury; it increased the solicitor of claims in the State Department; it increased some four or five or six other officers besides those named in the Senate bill.

Mr. SARGENT. The increased salary of all of whom is repealed by this amendment?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; then the President is the only one whose salary is continued during this term, with the intimation that it shall end by and by. If the Senator will allow me a moment, the point is simply this: that if there were constitutional power to repeal the salary of the President at once, so that he could receive the smaller compensation, and thereby be on an equality with those other officers whose salaries are repealed, I should raise no objection, except the one that his salary is not too great at the increased rate; but then it would be on an equality, and the Senator says plainly he is not now on an equality.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, it is only a question of names after all. Suppose we should pass this bill and say nothing about the President, or suppose we should pass it and except him from its operation, and fix no time when it should take effect upon him, I ask if the moral effect of it is not the same as by the amendment that is proposed here? We say to the country, according to the Senator's argument, that we do not touch the President's salary, because we cannot in the case that I have supposed. But, sir, it was not my purpose to argue this question at this time. At the proper time I shall attempt to give the reasons more at length for the course I have taken. I have no question as to it.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it was very far from my purpose to instruct the Senator from Iowa in his duties, and it is very far from my purpose, either, to be deterred in the expression of my own sentiments upon this floor by the assumption of that Senator, or any other one that I have not a full right and liberty so to do. I am not to be deterred from the expression of my sentiments because I am not, as the Senator implies, more than a young Senator on this floor. I shall endeavor, if I can, to express them modestly and properly; and express them I certainly shall, whenever in order under the rules. That is all that I desire to say in reply to the Senator's remark—perhaps sneer—as to the comparative age of himself on this floor and myself.

Now, sir, so far as related to the change in tactics of the Senator in the conduct of the bill, it was so obvious to every Senator around him that, it seems to me, it was a proper subject of remark. When there were amendments offered which he himself stated on the floor—as a reference to the RECORD of yesterday will show—that he believed to be right, he suggested that they, and all amendments, should be voted down, because otherwise the passage of the bill would be imperiled. But when there came an amendment which he himself had drawn and introduced in the form of a bill at the commencement of the session, or something resembling the bill that he then introduced, although it is not the same, he said that he wanted that to be adopted; and the only reason he gave was that it was a bill of his own introducing. If all amendments were to be voted down because they would imperil the bill, then, by the same logic, that amendment should have been voted down lest it should imperil the bill, and the Senator should not have voted for it.

It is true that, under the legislation of last session, the salaries of a number of officers were increased. All of them, except that of the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court, can be constitutionally repealed as ours is repealed, to take effect, as the Senate insists the repeal of ours ought to take effect, from the time of the passage of this bill. They are placed in the same category with ourselves. To that I do not object; and I would not object, except on the simple score of the inadequacy of the compensation, to a reduction of the salary of the President of the United States and the judges of the Supreme Court, if they also could take effect at the same time; but when there is a general amendment offered which, in terms, repeals everything that passed at that time, there is a proviso at the end which excepts from the general repeal the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Why is this? The Senator voted for that. That was a part of the amendment which the Senator desired to have incorporated upon this bill. Why except the salaries of the Supreme Court judges? As far as the Chief Justice is concerned it could not be upon any constitutional pretense, for there is now a vacancy in that office, and any law which we pass would take effect before the filling of the vacancy, or might be made to do so; but at any rate the judges' salaries should be put on the same footing with that of the President of the United States, if it is to be repealed and that repeal is to take effect at the close of the term. And here is another inequality forced upon the President of the United States—that while the increase of the judges' salary, which was complained of by this public clamor just as much as any other increase, is continued, the notification is given to the country that Congress thinks the President is getting too much—more than he ought to receive—and the law is changed, to prevent any subsequent President from taking advantage of the constituional technicality to retain more compensation than he ought to have.

Now, sir, I utter these sentiments in defense of the President of the United States, not because the present incumbent fills that place especially. I would do so in behalf of any President of any party, he being an honorable man who occupied that position. I would object to his being made the mark of scorn and contempt, excited in the minds of the people by the tirades of the evil-disposed conductors of the press for this reason; and I say that we do ourselves a wrong in passing a bill with this provision in it, thus singling him out and placing him at this disadvantage.

I believe, sir, that the bill is now in Committee of the Whole, and that a vote can be again reached on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Sherman, Thurman, and Wadleigh—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Clayton, Cooper, Crozier, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Saulsbury, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Sumner, West, and Wright—39.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Cameron, Conover, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Stewart, Stockton, Tipton, and Windom,—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move to add this additional proviso:

And provided further, That after the date last mentioned the salary of the President shall be $35,000 per annum.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is it in order to move to recommit the bill with instructions?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would be in order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I make the following motion: That the bill with the proposed amendments be committed to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, with instructions to report a bill looking to a general reduction of all salaries, both civil and military, as far as the same can be lawfully done; said reduction to be apportioned so as to equalize as near as may be the salaries of all officers in accordance with the nature and with respect to the amount of service rendered by them.

Mr. President, I do not offer this motion for the purpose of defeating the measure now before the Senate, but for the purpose of perfecting it and facilitating its passage. I am impressed with the opinion that this is a very important subject. I arrive at that conclusion from the fact that we were told before the late recess by many Senators that the bankrupt law was a question that we could not possibly allow to pass unacted upon during the time we proposed to occupy in the recess. We were told that the whole country was clamoring for action on that subject. We were told that the people were groaning under the evils inflicted by that law. We were led to believe that unless something was done, everything would go to rack and ruin. Now we find that question for nearly one week has been allowed to slumber here unacted upon, and this measure, which seems to be of such vital and paramount importance to all others, is thrust upon the attention of the Senate.

I cannot, therefore, agree with what has been said by many Senators on this floor, that we ought not to discuss this question, that we ought to act upon it at once, blindfolded as it were. I am in favor of its discussion. I do not believe that the people of this country expect us to act upon a great measure like this without giving it a careful consideration and a dignified and full discussion. From the debate that has taken place already I am satisfied that we can arrive at some measure which will meet the demands of the people of this country. I do not believe that the people ask us to do anything that will humiliate ourselves. I do not believe that the people ask us to act hastily on this or any other question. I believe that what they desire is that we shall so legislate that the greatest good may be done to the people. I believe that what they desire and ask is that we shall relieve them from the burdens of taxation, that we shall cut down as near as may be, not our own salaries alone, but all salaries of all officers in all branches of the Government, where we can do so justly and fairly to all parts of the country and to the public service.

I voted for this measure which it is now proposed to repeal, and under the same circumstances I would vote for it again; but the circumstances are somewhat different now. We know that the whole country is involved in financial distress; we know that the poorer classes of the people of this country are, in many instances, clamoring for bread; we know that labor and the prices of labor are being reduced everywhere. Then, Mr. President, I say that we can afford to reduce the price of our own services; but when I say that I want to treat all branches of the Government alike. I was very much impressed yesterday by the remarks of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] I do not know that his figures are correct—I presume they are—but I was impressed with the remarks of that Senator. It struck me, as it struck him, that we could make this matter thorough and complete. And, Mr. President, unless that can be done I think we shall fall short of what the people demand of us. I do not believe they demand us in hot haste to repeal this measure as it affects ourselves. I believe that their attention was directed to us; and when they directed their attention to us they intended that we should direct our attention to all branches of the public service. They intended when they called our attention to our salaries that we should direct our attention to the salaries of others and see whether we cannot, under the circumstances, relieve the people of a portion of their burdens.

Now, Mr. President, when I move to recommit this subject to the committee I do it with the best intentions. I do not do it for the purpose of throwing obstacles in the way; I do not do it for the purpose of defeating the measure; but, as I before said, I do it for the purpose of perfecting this measure and of facilitating legislation. I think there are other questions before the Senate which we can as well take up and act upon while the committee is considering this measure. We shall not lose time by laying this question temporarily aside, putting it in the hands of the committee and allowing the committee to carefully and calmly go over the whole ground and see if they cannot report to us something which shall be more acceptable to the Senate and to the country.

I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit with instructions.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, when the existing law was under consideration at the last session of Congress, I voted against it. I did not receive any back pay; indeed, for a very good reason—I could not get any. It so happened in this wise: Mileage was allowed to every Senator at the rate of twenty cents per mile for each session, and it so happened that there were four sessions of the Senate and three of Congress during the two years ending March 3, 1873, and my mileage was more than the back pay allowed me by that law.

I have now a few words to say on this question of mileage, as it seems to have attracted the attention of the Senate to a considerable extent. Objection has been made that the mileage is altogether too large, that twenty cents per mile should not be allowed. I admit that twenty cents per mile will more than pay every member of Congress for his actual expenditure in traveling from his home to the capital and returning; but I do not look at it in the light of mere compensation for traveling from the home of a Senator to the capital, but as a provision to compensate for that necessary travel which every member of Congress is required to do in order to transact the business devolved on him in a fair and reasonable manner. There is not a Senator here who does not at times go home and attend to his business and then come back here. Business necessarily calls him away sometimes. If traveling for this purpose is a necessary part of his vocation, why should he not be compensated for it to a certain extent? The Constitution provides that Senators and Representatives shall "receive a compensation for their services." What does "compensation" mean? It means an equivalent. If a Senator has to travel from his home here and then go back to spend the holidays with his family, and returns here again, why should he not have a reasonable compensation for that?

Take the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] He resides in Utica. He is at times necessarily called home to attend to his professional business there. Is it expected that he should do that at his own expense? I say it is no more reasonable to require that than that he should have his pay stopped when he leaves the Senate until he comes back.

Again, take a member of Congress from the Pacific coast, and especially I will say a Senator who comes here for the term of six years. He has to separate himself entirely from his family, ignore for the time being all family ties, or else he must bring them with him here; and let me say that no man coming from that coast, or from any distance, should come here without those with whom he is so dearly connected as his wife and children. He must therefore bring them to this place. It is true he gets enough to defray the actual cost in money of bringing them here; but still it is an expense that is imposed upon him in the discharge of his duties as a member of Congress. If a member of Congress chooses to allow his family to remain at home, he can, with the mileage that is allowed him, when the holidays come, return to them and spend those days with his family, as he ought to do, instead of idling his time away in the capital.

So I can see nothing wrong in allowing a reasonable compensation, and I do not think twenty cents a mile is unreasonable when it applies to a man's coming from his home here and returning there occasionally during the session to attend to his business. I think that is the principle which has always controlled; that the mileage is not a mere compensation for traveling one time, but for the necessary travel during the sessions of Congress.

Again, look at it in another light. Travel to the Pacific coast is no light thing. I know that my friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] and you, Mr. President, (Mr. STEVENSON in the chair,) have both intimated that the allowance of actual expenses would be really enough for every one. Now, suppose you were both to go with me to my home. Suppose you and I and my brother from Indiana should start on that journey. We commence here; we go for seven days by rail, traveling day and night, to the Pacific coast. Then we reach San Francisco, and we stop perhaps in a hotel, waiting there for the steamer three or four days, and by and by we get on board. We go about perhaps in a chopping sea, a little rough, or it may be making headway against the northwest breezes that blow there in the summer time. Presently we shall see our brother from Indiana sea-sick and looking forward wistfully. A sailor will come along and tell him, "Oh, you land-lubbers, go to the lee side; don't be heaving over here." I think I then look into my brother's face and say to him, "Brother PRATT, are actual expenses sufficient for this?" And he would look up and say, "I think twenty cents a mile is little enough for it all." [Laughter.] We go on; we reach my home in Oregon; we stay there, and we return perhaps by land, unwilling to come back the same way we went. "A life on the ocean wave" once is enough for us. We determine to return by stage-coach. Three days and three nights we ride in the body of that coach, rolling along in that way, dusty and dirty, way-worn and wearied, without sleep and without rest, consuming one month of time, because it will take at least two weeks to come and the same length of time to return if we expect to travel as men reasonably will. There is one month lost; one month of our precious time is lost; to say nothing of the hardships that we endure on the journey there and on the journey back.

I merely instance this to show that this question has two sides, and that there is a hardship involved; but I put it on the other ground to which I referred, that it is necessary to pay the ordinary expenses of Senators and Members when they go to attend to their necessary business at home. You might as well, on the same principle, say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that when he goes to Ohio to attend the courts, if it is necessary for him to go, he shall have a deduction from his pay here, and bear all the expense necessarily involved himself. Why should he pay it out of his own pocket? His actual expenses for travel in a year no doubt amount to more than his mileage. I dare say if his family were living in Ohio he would return to them two or three times during the session, and if he brings them here it costs him money to do it; and all this is because of the duty imposed on him as Senator.

So much for the question of mileage. I did not intend to say much on the subject, but while I am up I will refer to the position which I shall take and the vote which I shall cast when this bill comes before the Senate for final action.

As I said, I voted against the increase of salary last year. I shall now change that vote, and I will state the reasons why. Among other things, we know that the franking privilege has been abolished. I asked Mr. Merchant, the superintendent of our document-room, what would be the expense of postage for a Senator transmitting to his constituents the various documents which were given to us at the last session of Congress. After figuring it up he says it will be nine hundred and twenty-one dollars and some cents. "This," said he, "does not include the speeches that may be sent, nor does it include such seeds as may be sent from the Agricultural Department. It is simply the postage on the documents that each Senator is entitled to." So there is $921 postage on documents, and when we include other things which we may send from the Agricultural Department it would certainly bring the postage to over $1,000.

If this amendment should prevail and the salary be put at $5,000, that would deduct $1,000 already from our salaries, because I suppose every man here will send these documents to his constituents, as is expected of him. The voice of the country demands that they shall receive these documents, which are published for public use.

Now, what are the expenses of a Senator or Member of Congress here? Suppose he brings his family; and every Senator, I maintain, should, and so the President himself thought when he suggested the propriety of each State providing a residence for its Senators. I say every Senator should have his family here who has one, unless he lives in the immediate neighborhood, as some do. Every one who knows the price of rents knows that no suitable house can be rented and furnished for less than $1,800 or $2,000 a year, and most of the Senators live in houses that cost more than that. Take the coal bills and gas bills alone, and they are $500 more. Now make that simple deduction—$1,000 for postage, $2,000 for house and furniture, $500 for coal and gas bills—and what have you to live on? Fifteen hundred dollars to support the family of a Senator or Representative! Fifteen hundred dollars for all things that are to be bought in the market at the same high prices as rent, coal, and gas. How can a Senator lay up anything against the time when he shall leave here? It is not pretended that he can. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] stated that he could not live on his salary, and every one knows that he is a prudent man, given to no spendthrift habits, and so Senator after Senator has made the same declaration on this floor.

With all this before us, can it be expected that we shall satisfy the country that a reduction would be timely and proper now? I do not think it requires any great amount of talent to satisfy the people at large that living in this place, perhaps the most costly place in the whole country, we ought to be compensated in a reasonable way. It is true we might live on the cheapest pay; we might live on Potomac herrings; we might imitate the example of a frugal member of Congress some years back and bring our Bologna sausages in our pockets here and eat them. We know that that has been done; and yet with all the economy of that member from Ohio, one of those nimble-witted Bohemians who are so ready with their pens gave him the name of "Sausage Sawyer," and it has clung to him from that day to this. It shows that however men may economize, this thing of "poor but honest" will not pay in the eyes of the public. They expect their representatives to live decently; they expect them to live as a member of Congress should; they expect each Senator and Member to receive his constituents, when they come here, in a reasonable and an honorable way. They do not expect their Senators to go into the suburbs of the city to reside; and if they live in a proper way, as I have shown, it takes every cent of the salary that they get. I do not think the public sentiment is such that the people are crying out for this repeal knowing these facts. It is simply because they do not know the situation in which we are placed that this clamor is raised. I think when the subject comes to be understood it will all pass away.

Now, let us look at the duties of a Senator; let us look at his labors. The labors are not those which take place simply in this Chamber. This is nothing but, as it were, a dress parade. The work is done elsewhere. The work is done in committees. And let me say further that I believe the Judiciary Committee, on which is my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] has just as much work while it is in session as the Supreme Court of the United States. Its labors are just as hard, constant, and unremitting. Questions of great importance are presented before it. That is but one committee. Every member has other committee duties to attend to, and every one here knows that every morning until the time when the session of the Senate commences he is busily engaged in the discharge of his duties. Then there is correspondence at night. Every member must answer the inquiries of his constituents. It consumes his time to answer letters on public business. He cannot do it unless he employs a clerk; he cannot do it, at least, without great inconvenience to himself. If he employs a clerk, that is so much added to his expenses, and that is one reason why the salary should not be reduced.

Again, Senators are bored continually by office-seekers to go and see some one through whom they may get a situation either here or in some of the Departments. These things are to be attended to. It is true that those who belong to my party are not much troubled in this way now, but my friends of the majority are annoyed by applicants for office. All these annoyances a Senator has to endure, and on the small compensation I have mentioned.

But, again, a Senator is elected for six years. After that he goes out of office. He may be re-elected, it is true; but this is not like other offices. Officers of the Army are in office for life; the judges of the Supreme Court receive their salaries while they are in office and while they live.

Let us look now at some of the other salaries—at the salaries of, say, the heads of the different Executive Departments. They do no more labor than we do; their labors are not so exacting as ours, for they can employ clerks for everything they do. We must attend to our duties ourselves unless we pay a clerk out of our own pockets. Therefore I say, while our duties, if we discharge them aright, are more onerous, our compensation is far less than that of members of the Cabinet.

Then look at the military. What does the General of the Army receive? Thirteen thousand five hundred dollars. General Sheridan's salary is $11,000. Every major-general of the Army receives $7,500; every brigadier-general $5,500. Every brigadier-general receives more than any Senator is expected to get. They are also paid ten cents a mile for every mile they travel, and their offices are for life; and when they retire from active duty the United States still pays them their salaries. So much for the military.

The judges of the Supreme Court are paid $10,000 a year, and their offices are for life; and they can provide their homes here and live in ease and comfort all their days; and when they retire from office they still receive their salary, as when they were on the bench discharging their duties.

We ought to look at these things. Why is it that the members of this co-ordinate branch of the Government shall be paid less than either the executive or the judiciary? Have we not the same dignity to maintain? Are we not a co-ordinate branch of the Government? Why should we give every one a higher salary than we vote to ourselves? The Congress of the United States has the right to decide upon the questions of peace and war; it has the right to decide upon our internal and our foreign policy; and yet we are to work for a bare living! It is not just, and is not reasonable. If our salaries are to be lessened, why shall not every other one be? Ah, no; that would be destroying, gentlemen tell us, the dignity of office. Well, I do not see why Senators and Representatives should lessen the position that we hold in this Government—one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government. We ought to maintain its dignity. There is no use in our getting down in the dust of self-abasement and saying that we are unworthy of being on the same plane with the other branches of the Government. I think we are certainly equal to any one of them.

For these reasons it seems to me that we should not lessen our salaries, or, if we do, others should be reduced in proportion. I do not think the American people desire that we should come here and work for a bare living. Why, some of the ablest men that ever sat in this Chamber, princes and potentates of the realm of thought, have given their life-labors to the people here, and retired poor at last. I say if other officers are to be paid as they are, these old brain-workers, when they retire from public life and go to their homes to die, should have something more than the bare honor of having been a Senator. They should have some compensation by which they could live at ease at the close of their lives. I do not think the country demands this reduction. I know that I am not insensible to the public approbation or insensible to public condemnation. I dislike as much as any one to have it said of us that we are not doing our duty; but when these things are presented in a proper way to the people I think they will see them as I do. It has been said here by a dozen Senators on this floor, "The salary is too little, but let us yield to the public clamor; let us yield to the public demand; lessen our salaries now, and we can raise them hereafter." It seems to me that that is not the proper proceeding. It is only postponing that which we ought to do to-day. If our present salary is right, let us stick to it. If we can give good reasons for it, the public will be satisfied. If we cannot, of course we must be condemned. This is the view I take of it. I think it is a proper one; and I think we should do what we believe to be right now. Do what is right, and let the consequences take care of themselves. The people will be satisfied in the end.

There is another thing. A motion has been made to refer this bill back to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. I had thought of that myself. I shall favor the motion, but I would rather send it to a new committee. I have no doubt the Committee on Retrenchment is overburdened with labor; it has much to do all through the country. It seems to me that if we had another standing committee on officers and their compensations, or something like that, it would be one very much needed; and this matter could be referred to that committee, and they could take into consideration the salaries of all officers of the Government from the President down to a page, and have the subject presented in one systematic, comprehensive whole. That would certainly be better; and then, when any increase of salary was desired, let the petition for that purpose be referred to that committee. I know there is no such committee in existence now, but it seems to me it could be readily created; and having the subject of officers and their compensation constantly in view, every petition for an increase of salary could be referred to that committee; they would understand the whole subject; they could report, not only what would be a proper compensation for officials, but when it was necessary to dispense with any officer—and I have no doubt there are many that might be dispensed with now—they could so report.

Again, there are inequalities in the compensation of officers—glaring and gross inequalities—some doing the same amount of labor as others and receiving only one-half the salary. I do not see why women should not have the same compensation, when they perform the same labor, as men. There are a great many of them living on half the salary and doing the full amount of work of others. I think that is unjust and unequal, and it ought to be remedied.

I would prefer to have this whole matter referred either to this committee or to another, say a select committee, and let them examine the whole question of salaries; let them see what officers are necessary and what can be dispensed with. If there are any officers that could be displaced the committee could attend to them. Suppose a month or two, or even a session, should be consumed by this course, how much would be gained by it. I think the people would not censure us if we should dispense with the consideration of this bill for the present and refer the whole question to a committee, to investigate, and to report a bill fixing the salary of every officer of the Government, as I said, from the highest to the lowest; and then let us consider and act upon it. Then every one would know what he was to receive.

For these reasons I shall vote for the reference which has been suggested if the motion be made. I would prefer, as I said, that it should go to another committee unless this committee has ample time to attend to it among their duties. I would not wish to take it from their consideration if they have time to attend to it fully. I know it would take quite a long time and close investigation and constant attention. If they can find this time, I will certainly vote to refer it to them. If they find it impracticable, or if they cannot attend to it properly, let it go before a select committee, or create, if you please, an additional standing committee, as I have suggested, and let the matter be discussed as a whole; and the people, my word for it, will be satisfied in the end.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I did not think it was possible for this bill to get into such shape, or that the discussion should be so long protracted, that I could be induced to say one word in relation to the subject. But, sir, I have been reflecting this morning, and I have come to the conclusion that the Senate of the United States has now for five days been acting the play of "How not to do it;" and it is a question that we should consider, in my judgment, how long this play is to be continued—whether we will let other interests suffer by prolonging the discussion upon this question.

When the committee reported the bill to the Senate I made up my mind that they had met the average sentiment of Congress; that they had reported a bill upon which we could stand, those of us who had opposed the salary bill in the last Congress, and those who had voted for it and yet concluded it was now better to repeal it; and I believed that we might get a vote in a single day upon that plain, simple proposition demanded by the people, the simple repeal of the salary bill, especially so far as it related to members of Congress. But the friends of the measure were not content to stand upon that proposition. My friend from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT]—and I know that he was honest; I know that he meant well—came in here with a proposition that those members of Congress, some three hundred and seventy of them, who had been receiving a compensation under the law at the rate of $7,500 per annum, should restore one-third of the compensation they had received since the 4th of March last, or have it deducted from a reduced salary hereafter. I voted with him on that proposition when we reached a vote; but I very well knew that it could not carry; I very well knew that we could not find a majority in the Senate and in the House of Representatives who had taken this compensation, as they were entitled to do by existing law, who would vote to pay it back. Of course "unconstitutional" objections would be found, as well as uncomfortable objections. It was useless to present that amendment. It only tended to embarrass the bill. It only tended to defeat the passage of the bill. It was not so intended, but such was calculated to be its result.

Then, after that amendment was disposed of, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] came forward with an amendment which has been adopted by the Senate, which, in my judgment, greatly embarrasses this measure. I felt myself obliged under a sense of duty to vote against that amendment. It was a different proposition; it not only proposed the repeal of the salary bill so far as members of Congress were concerned, but it went to the employés around the Senate and House of Representatives, the men who do the labor here, and said, "We will also repeal their compensation and put them back where they were before."

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to correct him?

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call his attention to the fact that the bill as reported by the committee had the very effect he now speaks of; that is to say, it reduced the compensation of all the employés of both Houses, as well as that of members of both Houses; and the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland did not reach that question beyond what it had already been reached.

Mr. CRAGIN. I think the Senator from Iowa is correct; but the amendment did go to repeal the law increasing the salary of the assistant secretaries of three of the Departments, which was not included in the committee's bill; and it also went to repeal, if I recollect aright, the increased salaries of the heads of Departments and reduce them to their old salaries, whereas the committee's report placed them at $8,000 per annum.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not certain whether that is the same amount it was under the old law or not. I have the impression that it is.

Mr. LOGAN. It is the same amount.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then there is no change in that respect.

But, Mr. President, the main objection I had to this amendment was, as has been stated by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] that it singled out the President of the United States and said to him in plain words, "We believe that the salary as fixed by law for your office is too great, but as we cannot repeal it until the close of the present term, we will enact that after 1877 the salary of the President of the United States shall be $25,000; and you shall be hung up for three years and challenged to take the salary now provided by law, or to take simply $25,000 according to the salary as it was before, and as it will be after your term expires." It was placing the President in a most embarrassing position; it was, in my judgment, an insult to the President. Although not so intended, I have no doubt but the effect of it was to humiliate him and put him in a position where he would be most embarrassed; and for that reason I voted against that amendment.

Now, sir, this morning we have another amendment proposed looking in the same direction as the one offered by the Senator from Indiana, only going further and providing that the employés of the Senate and House of Representatives shall also pay back out of their salary what they have received additional since the 4th of March last. That amendment was voted down, as was the other offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Now, sir, the bill stands before the Senate with the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, and I am not disposed to join with those who criticise the chairman of the committee for voting for that amendment, because I think he was attached to it. It was only a choice with him between first-born and the second-born, and he chose the first. That is human nature, and we should not question too closely his motives in this matter; but I will join with those who say that he made a mistake. I think so. I think that if he had stood and voted against that amendment, this bill would be in a much fairer way of becoming a law than it is at present; it would have become a law much sooner.

Mr. President, I rose deprecating the delay, deprecating the consumption of time upon this bill. So far as my own record goes I have nothing to say. I have no apologies to make. It will be remembered by some that at the last session of Congress, when this original measure was passed, when we were all exhausted physically, and I especially, I made some intemperate remarks, perhaps, in protesting against the passage of the bill, and made certain predictions; and I am not happy to say that those predictions are verified, although such is the truth. I hope that we may without delay, without unnecessary delay at any rate, dispose of the bill. I hope we may not run this subject into next week and consume all the next week. I predict, however, that we shall, unless wiser counsels and a determination to stand by this measure and sit out, prevail. Unless we can dispose of this bill to-day I have no hope that we can reach a vote before a week from this time. I trust that we may reach a vote to-day, and that we may, so far as we can, satisfy the public demand upon this question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the question is on the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With instructions.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is one very good reason, it seems to me, in favor of recommittal; and that is, that it will extend the time of the increased pay four or five months probably to members of the Senate and the House. Inasmuch as I do not propose to be influenced by that consideration——

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senator if he regards this measure as a measure of economy or of a different character? Is this a measure of economy and retrenchment alone, or is it a measure to punish members of this body or cast reflections upon them? I take it for granted it is a measure of economy. Now, I should like the Senator from Iowa to answer me whether it is purely and strictly a measure of economy and retrenchment?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not know whether it is in the nature of economy or not. It depends on our action how far we can go; but I do not propose by this bill to correct all the evils of the time, and if we undertake to do too much my fear is that we shall not be able to do anything.

I only rose to say that there was, as I have stated, a very excellent reason why this bill could be recommitted; and that was, that we should have the increased pay, and all these officers would have it, for four, five, or six months, because we probably should not get a report before that time; but inasmuch as I do not propose to be influenced——

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether there are not other officers in this Government whose salaries should be reduced; and if so, whether they will not, during all the time that elapses hereafter, have the benefit of their enlarged salary? Take the Army officers, if you please. Will it not cut both ways? And so far as the public Treasury is concerned, and the reduction of taxes, will it not amount to about the same thing, if you recommit this measure and apply the pruning-knife to all alike?

Mr. WRIGHT. All that I have to say on that is, that I propose to reduce these at present, and not let them all run on for five or six months. I trust the motion to recommit will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit with instructions.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 22.

Mr. CLAYTON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope after we have spent a week over this unpleasant subject, putting aside subjects of vastly more importance, we shall not now, by recommitting this bill, have it before us again for discussion for another week. Let us stay here to-day until the bill is passed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. WINDOM. My colleague [Mr. RAMSEY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, Mr. GORDON, on all questions connected with this bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Spencer, Stevenson, and Tipton—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—41.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Bayard, Chandler, Crozier, Gordon, Johnston, Jones, Ramsey, Robertson, Stewart, and Stockton—12.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as amended.

Mr. LOGAN. Is the amendment now to be acted on by the Senate amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. LOGAN. I then offer the following amendment to the amendment: Strike out the word "President" in line 9, and strike out all of lines 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23, and line 24, to the words "and provided," and also insert the word "President" in line 26 before the words "Chief Justice."

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit that my friend is anticipating the time when he can offer that amendment. I think it is not in order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment before the Senate in its present form is only amendable by adding to it. It cannot be amended by striking out what has been already inserted by vote of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I asked the question of the Chair, and understanding that it was amendable I offered the suggestion. I see the force of the decision now. I will reserve the amendment until the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be amendable in the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the object he has in view can be reached by having a separate vote on the Hamilton amendment when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I merely desire to accomplish the object I have indicated.

Mr. HAMLIN. The first question will be on striking out that part of the House bill which is included in brackets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on striking out that portion of the House bill and inserting the amendment already agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is in order, then, to perfect the House bill before that motion is put?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I move to amend that bill where the compensation is made at $6,000 by striking out "$6,000" and inserting "$5,500."

Mr. MORTON. Let the House bill be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill as it would be, amended as proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first section of the House bill, if amended as now proposed, would read:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $5,500 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto, the actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maine by making that clause read "$5,000" instead of "$5,500."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine by striking out $5,500 and inserting $5,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think my motion will be first in order as being the larger sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That only applies to filling blanks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That rule applies to filling blanks.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the best thing we can do now is to defeat the amendment, and take the bill as it came from the House. That would be a substantial repeal of the law of the last session, with a slight increase in the sum formerly paid to each member. I do not think there is much in the phrase that we have heard here as coming from the people, that they demand a square repeal. We have had that repeated several times. It seems to have gotten into the minds of some gentlemen, and of that impression they cannot get rid. Some talismanic influence seems to be attached to the phrase "square repeal," as if the people were to be pleased and flattered by phraseology of that sort; as if they were not reasonable, and would not allow us to do about what was right under the circumstances. The people understand all about this business; they are not unreasonable in their demands; and if we fix this salary at what in their judgment would be the fair thing, it seems to me it does not matter whether it comes by a "square repeal," by a repeal in part, or by an amendment to the old law. I think the bill which came from the House is a fair one and a just one; and if we adopt it and let it become a law there will be very little objection to it. I should like to vote upon that bill by itself. I think it the best of the various propositions that are offered here. Let us get rid of all the amendments that have been offered and attached to this bill and pass the original bill as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not detain the Senate by making a speech. I will only say that the amendment brings this part of the bill which relates to salary merely exactly to what the law was before. Now, if we are in earnest about doing anything when we are on the precise point of salary, let us do that.

Mr. HAMLIN. The sum which I have named will bring the compensation to a little less than that which was paid to us prior to the act of March last, including mileage, and it will settle the vexed question of mileage. The motion submitted by the Senator from Vermont will virtually diminish our compensation $500 below what it was under the old law; mine will make it about what it was, perhaps $100 less. I do it for the purpose of keeping certainly within the sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to ask the Senate to delay the vote for a moment now that I may reply to my friend from Maine. I cannot, unhappily, put my two motions into one when I move to amend his $5,500 and bring it down to $5,000, because that is in the clause which relates to salary alone, and if I had offered an additional amendment at the same time I should have been out of order. If this amendment is agreed to, I hope my friend in charge of the bill, or somebody, will make a motion which will make the first part of this House bill a simple repeal, in effect, of the old law, even if it shall take effect now, and leave the old law exactly where it stood before in respect to compensation; and then we shall be left in the attitude of taking up a fresh bill at the proper time, which stands upon its own merits, and for the future to determine how this question of compensation and salary ought to be adjusted.

Mr. HAMLIN. And it is just upon that point that I disagree with the Senator, and ask the judgment of the Senate. He would leave open all this question of mileage again to disturb us; I would settle it now.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the roll is called I desire to place upon the record the figures. My figures differ a little from those submitted by my friend from Maine, and they may not have been arrived at in the same way. Taking the appropriation of March 3 for the salary and compensation of Members of Congress, Senators, and Delegates, I find that the pay for 74 Senators and 253 Members and Delegates was $1,635,000; mileage, $330,000; other perquisites, such as newspapers and stationery, for which $125 each, I believe, was allowed, $40,875, making $2,005,875. Taking that amount and dividing by 327, the number of Senators, Members, and Delegates, makes the pay $6,134, if it was equally distributed to each Senator, Member, and Delegate in Congress. That is the average amount of the pay and allowances, if equally distributed, under the law prior to March 3, 1873.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether that is not simply the amount appropriated; whether the amount that was actually paid is not five thousand five hundred and some odd dollars? I am informed that that is the case. His estimate embraces the appropriations, but not the amounts that were actually paid for compensation, for mileage, and for stationery. I am told that they amount to simply five thousand five hundred and some odd dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. I took these figures from the appropriations. Of course I did not inquire any further than that. The appropriation for pay, I suppose, was based upon an estimate of the exact amount required for the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, and the appropriation for stationery, I presume, was for the exact amount required; each member receiving so much in round numbers. The mileage was computed exactly as a matter of course, because they have the estimates for each member, and the appropriation was made in accordance with these estimates. Taking these figures the pay, equally distributed, would be $6,134. Of course I asked no clerk in regard to it; I merely took the appropriations. By the statement of our Secretary, which has just been handed to me, I see that the average for Senators is $5,922.33 and a fraction of a cent. The reason why the Senators' compensation alone, adding it together and dividing by the whole number, is less than when you put the pay of the two Houses together and divide by the whole number of the two Houses is, that there are a greater number of Representatives from far-off distances drawing large mileage than there are Senators. The distributive amount to Representatives and Delegates is larger than the distributive amount to Senators for that reason; but when you put both together and then distribute the whole amount equally it makes the sum I have stated, as I understand.

Mr. PRATT. I have no information on the subject except what has just been communicated to me by a member of the House of Representatives who has examined the matter very carefully; and he tells me that the statement which has just been given by the Senator from Illinois embraces the appropriations correctly that were made for the compensation of members, mileage, and stationery; but that in point of fact the sum paid out of that fund amounted for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in the House of Representatives to five thousand five hundred and some odd dollars.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely took the appropriations as they appeared. I have not talked with the clerks on the subject, for I have not had time since this morning; but I was told by a gentleman that the reason of that is that sometimes, owing to the resignation of a member and the lapse of time, the pay would not be the same as if it continued, according to some of the different payments made there. I do not know exactly how that is; I do not pretend to say; but that is the information I had. I do not say that it is correct, for I have not taken the pains to go to the Secretary's office and examine there. I made it up from the law, and not from the statement of any of the officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to have the question stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] moves to strike out $6,000 in the House bill and insert $5,500, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moves to amend that amendment of the Senator from Maine by striking out $5,500 and inserting $5,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] on this question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Buckingham, Carpenter, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windon, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Sprague, Spencer, and Tipton—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Gordon, Johnston, Jones, Ramsey, Robertson, Stewart, Stockton, and Sumner—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 23, noes 26.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, to carry out what I stated, the restoring of the old law, I move, in this perfection of the House bill that we seem to have gotten back to all at once, to strike out in lines 6 and 7 the words "actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate," and to insert the words "and mileage allowed by law prior to the act of March 3, 1873," so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the mileage allowed by law prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senator from Vermont if we shall not do that precise thing if we make the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely we shall; but the Senator from Maine, under his right, went back to the original House bill to perfect it, and we have taken one step toward perfecting it; and now let us take the second, and then we can go back to the amendment of the committee if we want to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend that amendment by inserting before the words "the mileage" the words "one-half of." I do not like the idea of increasing our pay by mileage. Let us make it a round sum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the amendment of his colleague so that it will provide for one-half the mileage.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. In either form which this amendment may assume it is a revival of the old system of mileage. The only feature in the law of last March which the people of the country have almost unanimously approved was the abolition of the mileage system. Now we propose to restore that same abuse, and with the result that that abuse will probably continue for a very indefinite time in the future; for, as was well said here yesterday, it is not probable that the settlement of this question of compensation which we now make will be disturbed for a great while to come. I think that upon this matter the act of last spring contains the only true principle—that the member shall be paid his actual traveling expenses; and there is no difficulty, that I can see or imagine, in any member of the House or of the Senate making a careful estimate of those traveling expenses. I hope that the old mileage abuse will not be revived under this pretense of reform.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] which proposes to reduce the mileage one-half; and I shall then vote against the amendment of the other Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] for I am opposed to this whole mileage system. If there has ever been an objection to any subject I think there has been a decided objection for years to the payment of mileage to members of Congress. It was enacted at a time when the modes of transportation to this capital were very different from what they are now. A gentleman had to take his private carriage and travel for hundreds of miles, at much fatigue and expense, to reach this capital. Now the modes of transportation and the facilities of reaching the capital are so great that almost any member of the Senate can come here from his home in a week, or eight days at farthest. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment now pending, and subsequently I shall vote against the amendment which proposes to make an allowance of mileage. I would prefer to see a single sum. I am perfectly satisfied with the sum of $5,000 as a full compensation for members of Congress for their services. I think that such a sum would meet the approval of the whole country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only rise to reply to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] for whose good judgment I always have the greatest respect. I was a little amused to hear him, in support of his opposition to my last proposition, appeal to the opinion of the people, when I think I remember that he had not a very high respect for what has been called the opinion of the people upon the subject of the salary business. It seems that the opinion of the people is not good for anything when it disagrees with his own, but is something to stand upon when it agrees with his. I might agree with him about the first branch of the proposition, but I do not think he needs the last branch of it.

Now, to come back to the point, Mr. President—and I will not occupy time—I will condense into a word what I have to say about this mileage. I beg leave respectfully to say that the mileage principle, though the amount allowed may be too great or too small a sum, is the best possible way to provide for the travel of members of Congress from their homes to this capital. Our forefathers I do not believe acted upon the idea that a member of Congress was to take his carpet-bag and "go it alone," as the saying is, but that he was to bring his family here, and his servants here, if he had any, and was to set himself up in such a condition as that he could be at the same time respectable and comfortable upon the pay that he had. The mileage, therefore, was not intended to pay the bare railroad fare of one man, who might have a pass in his pocket at that, (a matter which we ought to look into while we are on this subject of actual traveling expenses, and be careful that nobody travels by commutation or computation or by favor,) but it meant that a reasonable allowance was to be made for the whole body of the two Houses—who might be expected generally to be men in middle life, who, presumably, had families, or ought to have at any rate, and to that extent ought to be encouraged in providing themselves with families—to come here, where they are obliged to stay for six months, with their families. I think every Senator will agree that when he comes on with his family of four or five or six persons, the average of families under the census of the whole population of the United States, the amount of mileage under the old law, even from Oregon, if the sums were paid, not commuted by passes and favors, but actually paid, as we must presume they are, and they ought to be, would not be excessive, because in proportion to the distance the mileage is no greater for Oregon than it is for Vermont; and I find, with my small family, under the old law, when I get to Washington, I have not saved enough from the mileage to pay the boot-black and the paper-man the next morning; and I do not pretend to be usually a very extravagant man. Therefore, the principle of mileage, in my judgment, is the right one. If it be too large, then reduce it upon principle; but have it fixed at a certain sum, which shall be sufficient for the member to come here with those with whom he is accustomed to live, and have his domestic life at home.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, a friend asked me the other day if I was going to speak on this question, and I told him that unless God forgot me I should not speak. [Laughter.] I am afraid that God has forgotten me, and I am not sure but that He has forgotten us all, and I am sometimes a little inclined to think that I wish He would [Laughter.] I am not particular about being taken notice of at present. [Laughter.] Any way, I propose to say just a word about this question of mileage. I intended to vote on every proposition that should be submitted here, from the beginning to the end of this controversy, whether it ended this year or next, just as my judgment dictated; and hereafter if anybody in God's universe should be curious to know why I voted as I did, I will tell him in a respectful way.

But yesterday, or the day before, I voted against a motion made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to reduce the mileage to ten cents, instead of twenty cents as it now stands. I had said before—not in the Senate, but outside—that if that proposition were made at any other time than while this bill was pending I would support it, for I am inclined to think, and I have some experience on that question, that ten cents a mile will pretty nearly cover the expense of bringing a member here with his family. It will not cover the expense in every case. Of course it depends upon the size of the family. But I stand here now to say that what the Senator from Vermont who usually sits before me [Mr. EDMUNDS] remarked, to wit, that the principle of mileage is the fair principle upon which to adjust the compensation for coming here, is a correct remark; and I rise to say to the Senator from Maine who was by my side just now, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and to the Senator from Delaware who sits across the way, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] that I think they are both mistaken when they fancy that they are opposed to mileage. They both seem to me to ask for compensation for coming here, but they both seem to me to insist that the United States shall pay the same compensation for bringing a Senator or a Member here from Delaware or from Maine that is paid for bringing a member here from Nebraska or from Oregon. That is not fair.

The people of the United States, I think, are willing that members should bring their families here, and are willing to pay a fair price for bringing them. And I differ entirely with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] when he says that the people have made clamor against the mileage principle. I never heard a word of it in my life anywhere. I do not think there ever was any complaint on the part of the people with reference to that principle of our compensation. I think, however, since all sorts of amendments are pressed here, since one has been agreed to, that I will reverse the vote I gave the other day, and vote with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to put the mileage down to one-half the present rate, which I think, as I said before, is about an adequate compensation, in the hope that it will stand there, and that that will end this whole controversy; and that then we shall agree to the report made by the committee, and send the bill from the consideration of this House.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word upon this bill. I voted for the law of last year increasing salaries because I thought it was right. I thought the compensation as fixed by that law was about the amount which a Senator or Representative should receive. I did not care about the compensation myself; but a good many gentlemen in both Houses came to me and said that while they knew I did not care about the compensation, they trusted I would have some liberality toward others who were not so able to pay their expenses in coming here and while they were here as they believed I was; and therefore I voted for the bill.

I had another great reason for voting for that bill, because it rid us of the annoyance of the mileage system. That has been a question which has annoyed and given unpleasant sensations to members of Congress ever since I have been a member of this body. I remember perfectly well that the first year I came to the Senate, a person editing a paper in New York became a great reformer on the subject of the franking privilege and the mileage. He put down the mileage of everybody who was then in Congress, and he put me down as having charged for eight miles more than I really traveled in coming here. I have no doubt he was honest; but in getting those eight miles more than he saw looking at the map I had to travel a distance of some seven or eight miles to cross the river Susquehanna. There were no ferries except that from my house until you came to where the river empties into the Chesapeake Bay, and of course I charged what I believed the law allowed me for the distance I actually traveled. I believe my whole charge for coming here was fifty-four dollars. After a while we made railroads; we built a bridge over the river close by where I live, and my mileage got down to forty-eight dollars; but I was still charged with having made my expenses too high.

On looking over the accounts the other day, I found that a gentleman who served in the Senate at the same time I did charged fifty-two dollars for coming from Baltimore, where he resided, forty miles from here. I came a hundred and twenty miles, and I got but forty-eight dollars, while he received fifty-two dollars. It was a mere error of opinion, because there is not a more high-toned, proud gentleman in the United States than that gentleman, for he is still living; but still I was subjected to this censure by somebody who wanted to complain of me. The other day I sent to the Secretary's office and got a statement of the mileage paid to every member of the Senate under the act of 1856, and also under the act of 1866; and as showing how utterly wrong, unjust, and unequal this whole mileage system is, let me present it to the Senate. Here it is:

Thus it will be seen that before this mileage was changed under the law increasing the compensation from $3,000 to $5,000, some Senators received nearly $6,000, and I believe one Senator got $9,000, for mileage, while other Senators received only the annual compensation of $3,000. That was not fair. It is not fair now under this bill that some Senators shall get $1,700 for mileage, while a man coming from New Hampshire, traveling nearly as far, shall get but $200, or that I, coming from Harrisburgh, where it costs me nothing but $5, shall get $48. That is all wrong. I am therefore inclined to vote for the sensible amendment offered the other day by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] for he is always sensible. He is one of the wisest men that I have known in this body; and I say it because he is not now in his seat. He is always right; and if you will take his amendment there will be no complaint.

Mr. President, it matters very little to me whether I get $3,000, or $5,000, or $7,500 a year; or whether I get, as I did when I first came here, $8 a day—which amounted to about $1,600 a year. That paid my expenses then, and a little over. The salary of $3,000 a year paid something more than my expenses, and the $5,000 a year paid not a bit more than the $3,000; and the $7,500 will not pay a bit more, because these people in Washington always manage by their great skill and kindness and benevolence to get all that I receive.

This question of mileage is always bringing us into trouble. I remember hearing of a gentleman who was a member of the Legislature of one of the States somewhere along the coast, and he lived on a place called Rock Island. I think the island was about thirty miles from where the Legislature met. He was an honest, good man, who swore to the truth, and believed that if he did not tell the truth under his oath he would go to eternal damnation. When he brought in his bill for mileage he had a charge of forty dollars, at four cents a mile, for coming to where the Legislature met. Somebody thought it was an outrageous charge, and said to him, "Mr. Jones, how does it come that you charge forty dollars, when I live the same number of miles from the seat of government that you do, and I charge but three dollars?" Said he, "My God! didn't I come in a ship, and hadn't I to take in all the tackings and windings of the vessel; and we were driven about by the winds and the sea until I had to travel four hundred miles to get down here?" [Laughter.] Now that was an honest man. And so it might be with a gentleman coming from California or some place else. He would be compelled to take a railroad going away down to San Francisco, and then away up—not to Utah, because I think that would be in a straight line—but somewhere up to look after Jay Cooke's improvements on the Northern Pacific, [laughter,] and then come down by Minneapolis and Saint Paul, and then go to New York and come around here; and he might not think he was wrong in charging for every mile he went over, because the Government of the United States thinks it is perfectly right to send the mail going from here to Elmira through Baltimore and through Philadelphia and up to New York, and then away around to Elmira, while Elmira is nearer to the city of Washington than it is to the city of New York. The mail is carried away around there, and has been from all time, because the people were in the habit in the first place of going by the canal to New York, and then from there around this way, and they thought there was no other way of going there; and so the mail goes now.

Whether I vote to reduce this pay or not makes no difference to me, and there is not one of my constituents who will complain. Last year, after I voted for the salary bill, the Legislature of Pennsylvania increased the salary of her governor from, I think, $4,000 to $10,000 a year, and everybody said it was right. Those who growl are not my friends. [Laughter.] Besides that, the people of Pennsylvania are an intelligent and liberal people. They know that a man is worth all that he can get by his honest services; and no man there has complained of any vote I ever gave in this House. I say I voted for that salary law because I believed that it was right that a Senator serving here should be paid such a compensation as would induce the best talent of the country to come here, and not prevent poor men from coming. When I first came here the dollars might have been of some account to me; the compensation certainly was of some account; but since I have grown old I care very little about that; and I suppose it will be so with all of you gentlemen when you get as old as I am. I should be perfectly willing to serve here without any compensation, if I alone were to be benefited or injured by it; but I am not willing that in a Government like ours, where every man may aspire to the highest place under the Government if he has merits, he shall be kept from filling the highest place in the country only because he is not able to come here and pay his own expenses.

Something has been said in regard to the compensation of the gentlemen who hold Cabinet offices. We are told that they ought to have higher pay than the members of Congress because they are compelled to entertain. Why are they compelled to entertain? No man is compelled to do that because he occupies a place here. It is supposed that if he does entertain his friends it is because he is able to pay the expenses of their coming here. I entertain my friends at home, and I shall be glad to see, at any time and on all occasions, every member of the Senate there; and I shall not growl at all because it costs me something. The honor which gentlemen receive from having held the office, and the power which they exercise as members of the Cabinet, ought to be sufficient to compensate them for their expenses. Few men have ever occupied a place in the Cabinet—whether because of accident or design I do not know—who could not afford to entertain everybody who came to see them without any compensation from the public.

I did not intend, as I remarked before, to say a word on this subject, and I do not much care how I vote; but if the proposition of the Senator from Maine can be entertained at all, putting us back exactly where we were, with the exception of this troublesome question of mileage, I will cheerfully vote for that.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; we might as well take the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ramsey, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, and Stevenson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sumner, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Conover, Fenton, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Robertson, Stewart, Stockton, and Tipton—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I wish to occupy about five minutes to correct, if possible, a very prevalent mistake with respect to the question of mileage.

The general idea is that mileage has been allowed members of Congress as a reimbursement of their traveling expenses. There is no foundation whatever for that idea; there never was any foundation for it. On the contrary, mileage has always been allowed upon the theory of paying a member for the time employed in traveling to and from the capital. The idea upon which the mileage act went was this: that as the Constitution provided that Senators and Representatives should receive a compensation to be ascertained by law, that compensation was to be measured by the time expended by those members in the service of the Government; and that therefore, as a member who lived at a distant point from the capital was under the necessity of expending more time in the public service, counting the time that was spent traveling to and from the seat of Government, he was entitled to more compensation than the member who lived near the seat of Government; not that there was any different rate of compensation, but that they were all to be paid alike at a uniform rate for the time actually employed in the service of the Government. And, therefore, it was estimated by the First Congress, at a time when there was scarcely any travel in the country except upon horseback, that twenty miles per day was a fair average distance to expect any man to travel with the means of locomotion which then existed. Hence the pay of members of Congress was fixed at a per diem of six dollars per day during the time of their actual attendance in Congress, and at six dollars for every twenty miles of travel, it being estimated that twenty miles of travel was equivalent to twenty-four hours. And what shows it more conclusively is the provision that if any one of them were taken sick on his way to the capital, or on his return, each day of his necessary detention by sickness should be counted as a day, and he should receive six dollars for that. I have before me now the first act passed on the subject, the act passed by the First Congress; and you will see that I am quite right in this; and the same principle has obtained ever since. It provides—

That at every session of Congress, and at every meeting of the Senate in the recess of Congress prior to the 4th day of March, in the year 1795, each Senator shall be entitled to receive six dollars for every day he shall attend the Senate, and shall also be allowed at the commencement and end of every session and meeting six dollars for every twenty miles of the estimated distance by the most usual road from his place of residence to the seat of Congress; and, in case any member of the Senate shall be detained by sickness on his journey to or from any such session or meeting, or after his arrival shall be unable to attend the Senate, he shall be entitled to the same daily allowance.

The idea was that we should receive a compensation, and in order to make that compensation uniform and just, it was made a per diem compensation; and twenty miles' travel was estimated then as the fair average day in going to and from the capital; and if the means of locomotion were now the same that they were when that act of 1789 was passed, no man in the country would have one word to say against the payment of mileage. The whole criticism upon mileage arose from the fact that, with improved means of locomotion, a man instead of traveling twenty miles in twenty-four hours came to travel twenty miles in one hour, and consequently got five or six or seven days' pay for one day's service. That was the trouble; that gave rise to the difficulty which exists now; and the mileage system, therefore, is to that extent unjust. It is no longer a per diem, as it was originally intended to be, but in point of fact a man receives for one day's time what was intended to be the pay for half a dozen or a dozen days' time.

Mr. President, I think that there have been great abuses under the mileage system, and they ought to be corrected, if possible; but you never will correct them if you go upon the theory of simply paying actual expenses. With what justice can you say that the Senator from Maryland, living within three hours of this capital in travel, shall receive exactly the same compensation, or nearly so, although it takes him but three hours to come here at the beginning of the session and three hours to return home, that the Senator from Oregon receives, when it takes him one entire month to go and to come? He devotes to the service of the Government one month more time than does the member from Maryland who lives within sight of the Capitol. What justice is there in that? There is none at all. It was to obviate such an injustice that members were originally paid per diem, and that a fair average number of miles was considered as a day spent in traveling.

Now, the way to get at this thing and make it just, is, not to adopt the idea of actual expenses, but to so regulate this mileage as that the members shall be paid a per diem for the time that they are traveling; and that does not conflict at all with the idea of a fixed salary, because the theory, as I said before, whether you have a fixed annual salary or not, is that the members shall be compensated for the time spent in the service of the Government; and if you have a fixed salary, and yet the practical fact is that some members have to expend a month in traveling to and from the seat of Government and others but a few hours, it is but just to make the former a compensation that shall pay them for this time which they are compelled to expend and which others of us who only live a few miles from the capital are not. You must, therefore, if you would make this thing just, discard the idea of actual expenses and so equalize it that you will not require that a Senator from Oregon or a Senator from California shall give up one month of his time in traveling back and forth from the seat of Government, while I and my colleague can go and come in forty-eight hours.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the general drift of the Senator from Ohio is unquestionably correct, but he is entirely wrong in the application at the present time. Formerly we did pay a per diem. We no longer pay a per diem, but pay a salary for the whole year; our entire time, if called for, is paid for by the Government. Some compensation should be made for mileage in some shape, and, admitting, as he does, that it is a great abuse, I trust that I shall have his vote to correct it so far as the amendment proposed by me goes, which is certainly a reasonable amount even for the Senator from Oregon, and it is amply sufficient for those of us who live nearer.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Ohio is quite accurate in his statement that the intention of the fathers was to pay for time. In my humble judgment, their intention was that every Senator and every Member of Congress should travel with his family; bring his family here in the family carriage if he had one; and the assumption was that a pair of horses, through the bad roads of that time, would travel with the family about twenty miles a day. The intention of the fathers evidently was, and it was the practice for members of the Senate and for members of the House, to travel with their families; and the six dollars a day was supposed to be compensation for the expense of travel for the man and his family. Now I am disposed to encourage the idea that the fathers inculcated. I want members to bring their families here when they come. I do not want the Senator from Oregon, who may have as large a family as the Senator from Delaware, to be prohibited from bringing his family from Oregon here at great expense in order to increase the salary of my honorable friend from Delaware. There is no parity of reason in the cases. The Senator from Oregon may have as large a family as my honorable friend from Delaware. If he has that family, he cannot travel night and day and Sundays right through from Oregon here. He must stop at San Francisco and rest with his family; he must stop from time to time on the road and rest with his family; and my word for it if he has a large family twenty cents a mile will not pay his expenses from Oregon here to-day with his family. It is but a simple act of justice, an act of justice which it was intended should be done when the original law was passed, that men should be enabled upon the allowance given by Congress to travel with their families and keep their families here. Now if the Senator from Delaware sees fit to bring his family here he may bring them, even if their number be large, for an expense of fifty dollars, while it will cost the Senator from Oregon to bring his family here every cent of his mileage.

Mr. GORDON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator from Michigan seems very anxious that Senators should bring their families here. I should like to ask the Senator what they will do with their families with a pay of $5,000 when they get them to Washington?

Mr. CHANDLER. They can live very well upon it, [laughter;] I have tried it.

Mr. GORDON. I ask the Senator if he spends less than $5,000 a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have done it in the course of my life, and could do it again if necessary.

Mr. GORDON. In Washington?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, I have done it in Washington, and can do it again if necessary.

Mr. CAMERON. Allow me to say a word to my friend from Michigan. The Senator from Michigan says he has lived here for $5,000 a year, but he forgets to say that he had a house of his own which, if it had been rented by anybody else, would have cost at least $5,000 a year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, we are not discussing my private expenses, Mr. President. [Laughter.] I have always contrived to pay as I go, and I expect to do so as long as I live; but I object to taking from the mileage of the Senator from Oregon what is justly his due and giving it to those Senators who live near by.

Another thing, Mr. President. If the Senator from Delaware has occasion to go home to attend to his law cases he can do it. If the family of the Senator from Oregon is sick, or his relatives are sick, or death occurs in his family, it costs him many hundreds of dollars to go home and attend to the case of sickness or death, while the Senator from Delaware can go home in three hours at an expense of not over $2.50. There is no reason on earth why the reduction should be made from the Senator from Oregon or from the Senator from California, or anybody, for the benefit of Senators from Maryland, or Delaware, or New York, or New England. I object to the whole thing.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] for two reasons.

In the first place, I have determined to vote to repeal the law of 1873, and to place the salary precisely where it was before; every vote I have cast has been in that direction, and my votes will continue to be so given.

I vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] for another reason. I believe that the mileage principle of compensation is the only equitable and fair principle of adjusting it. I will not enumerate the reasons, already better given than I can give them. But I would much rather vote for a reduced salary and an increased mileage, although it makes no sort of difference with my compensation whether I vote for the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] making the pay $5,500 a year and actual traveling expenses, or vote for $5,000 with mileage, so that I can speak entirely disinterestedly upon that point; but because I believe in the principle of compensation by mileage, I would vote for $5,000 and mileage, which would make my compensation a little less than $5,500, rather than to vote for $6,000 without mileage; because I believe one to be just and the other to be unjust.

I know, Mr. President, that a number of Senators—and I have known it to be so with members of the other House—do transact their business at home; they are not compelled to break up their business as members living in California, Oregon, and other distant places are. I have seen members sitting at their desks in the House of Representatives preparing briefs for their courts. I know of gentlemen of this body who return home almost every week to continue their business; they are not compelled to give it up as gentlemen living at a distance are.

But without going into these reasons any further, I believe in the mileage compensation, and shall vote against every motion to reduce it; and I shall also vote to repeal the existing law and place it where it was before the late act.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to correct a statement that I made a few minutes ago. I believe I said that I had lived on $5,000 a year in Washington. I did not intend to say that. I have lived on it, but I did not intend to say that I had lived on that in Washington. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I apprehend, sir, that the objection of the people to the increase made by the act of the 4th of March last was not so much to the increase itself as to the manner in which it was adopted, and the retroactive features of the act. There seems to be an objection to the manner more than to the increase; and I believe that it is the desire of the Senate that we shall place the matter just where it stood before the act increasing the pay was passed. I have a sincere desire to see that done, and shall vote to that end. I therefore desire to offer an amendment, to come in after the word "mileage," so as to read in this way: "mileage and other allowances."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator to withhold that until the question is taken on the present amendment, when it will be equally in order, and let us see if we are willing, on the question of mileage alone, to restore the law as it stood. Then he can offer his amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. I accept the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the amendment; and I offer it now as I expect to leave the city this evening. It is the same amendment which I offered yesterday to the committee's substitute, and I suppose there will be no objection to it. It is to add—

Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed or paid to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates for the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is that?

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Vermont asks why that is. If we repeal the act of 1873 and restore the law paying $5,000 a year and mileage, as is proposed by the House bill, by the bill from the committee of the Senate, and by the bill as it now stands, each member will be entitled to draw his mileage, as I understand, for the session after we have already drawn pay at the rate of $7,500, and actual expenses. This amendment of mine will save about $150,000. Some of us have been trying to go back and save some of the excess over $5,000 since the 4th of March. There cannot be any doubt that this amendment is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it is necessary, because I suppose that where we have settled and received our compensation for coming under existing law, we probably should not be expected to unsettle it, beause that has gone by. At least that seems to have been the vote of the Senate. In that point of view I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire; but I will let the Senate vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] to the amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Senator from Vermont thinks there is no need for this proviso. To my mind there is. We are now living under the salary law of 1873. This bill proposes to repeal that and to revive the law that was in existence prior to the passage of that act, which provides that each member shall receive $5,000 per annum salary, and mileage for two sessions per Congress.

Mr. WEST. If I have properly understood the sentiment of the Senate, it is now arriving at the point of determining that the compensation shall be restored to the old rule, $5,000 per annum and mileage. Under the proposition that is now made by the Senator from New Hampshire, the compensation for this session will be so much less than it was before. Now, he can accomplish the object that he desires by saying "and where actual mileage has been paid it shall be deducted from the mileage due." That will accomplish it. For instance, if he will word his amendment "less the amount actually paid for traveling expenses," I will cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. CRAGIN. We have all been receiving pay since the 4th of March at the rate of $7,500 a year; and I presume nearly if not quite every Senator has presented his account to the Secretary of the Senate for actual expenses of travel under the existing law. I know many have received it. To avoid paying the mileage over again, if this bill passes, is the object of the introduction of this amendment. I think it must strike everybody as manifestly right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as amended.

Mr. HAMLIN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, to strike out of the House bill the words "actual individual expenses of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate," and insert, "mileage allowed by law prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum, payable monthly, and in addition thereto the mileage allowed by law prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1873, in going to and returning from the seat of Government once in each session, to be certified in writing by each.

And after the word "each," to add:

Provided, That mileage shall not be allowed or paid to Senators, Representatives, or Delegates for the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. MORTON. I desire simply to say that I think the provision that Senators shall be allowed their individual traveling expenses is not a good one. It leaves a Senator to pay out of his salary the expense of bringing his family here. It discourages the bringing of families here to spend the winter in the capital; and I think in that respect it is bad—bad to those who have large families, as was remarked by the Senator from Michigan, or who have to bring them a long way. It becomes very expensive and onerous. If the amount of mileage under the late law was too high, let it be reduced by the motion of the Senator from Vermont farthest from me, [Mr. MORRILL;] but still I think it ought to be sufficient to pay the expenses not only of the Senator, but of bringing a reasonable-sized family here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 34, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Ramsey, Sargent, Sprague, Thurman, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Crozier, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamlin, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ransom, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Sumner, and Wadleigh—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Fenton, Gilbert, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Robertson, Schurz, Stewart, Stockton, and Tipton—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, as amended on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I now offer my amendment, to insert after the word "mileage," in line 9 of the part of the House bill just amended, the words, "and other allowances." That puts the law just as it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed to insert after the word "mileage" in the amendment first adopted the words "and other allowances." The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to offer an amendment to the first section of the House bill as now amended, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the first section of the bill the following:

Provided, That the salaries of all officers of the Army and Navy whose pay is $2,000 per annum or more, and that the salaries of Government officers and employés and heads of Departments, and of all who receive pay of $2,000 or more from the Government Treasury, and whose salaries are not fixed by the Constitution, be, and the same are hereby, reduced in the same ratio, at the rate of 25 per cent., calculated upon the full pay and all allowances now paid under law: Provided further, That instead of mileage, the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress shall receive actual traveling expenses as now provided by law, and that officers of the Army traveling under orders shall receive only their actual traveling expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the last part of it, about actual expenses, is directly the reverse of what the Senate has just voted.

Mr. GORDON. I did not intend to offer the last part, the Senate having just voted on that point. I withdraw that portion of the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust, however much of justice and propriety there may be in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, he will not seek to incumber this bill in any form by the amendment that he now offers. These are matters that we can attend to in due time if it becomes necessary. The proposition as it stands now, what it is proposed to do, is a simple repeal either of the entire act of the 3d of March last or of a portion of it. My friend from Georgia must see that it will necessarily follow, if we undertake to add on all these things, that we shall either never get through with this bill or that it must fall. I therefore beg of him that he will not insist on this amendment, and I beg of the friends of the bill that they will not undertake to put upon the bill those matters that must certainly result in its defeat. We are proposing a simple repeal of the old law. Now, if my friend will offer a bill on this subject and have it referred to the committee in the proper way, or if we take up this whole subject of salaries in time, I will join with him most cordially in the general proposition; but at present, when we are simply seeking to repeal the law, I trust he will not insist upon this.

Mr. GORDON. I am sorry to disoblige the Senator from Iowa, but the point of difference between us is too decided to be determined by anything short of the decision of this body. The question is simply this: whether the Senate means economy or means to deceive the people into the belief that we are for economy. The question, as I understand it, is not whether Senators are to live upon $5,000, but the far more important one as to whether we are to have economy in the administration of this Government in all its branches.

Now, sir, for one I am ready to state upon this floor and everywhere that I believe the salaries of Senators are too low as fixed by this amendment, and that the salaries of military men are too high, as they are fixed by existing laws. Sir, we have had enough of the elevation of the military at the expense of the civil departments of this Government, and every step we take in that direction, every time we discriminate against the legislative department of the government, as we shall do if, in our pretended efforts at retrenchment, we refuse also to strike down the exorbitant salaries of the military, we are pursuing the precise course which tends to the destruction of republican government.

That is a political objection to the course we are pursuing; but if we refuse to adopt this amendment, we shall refuse to relieve the country of the real extravagance, and that is an economic objection. On both grounds I must insist on a vote on this question. I desire the country to know whether we mean economy or do not mean economy. I desire the country to know whether we mean to continue the extravagant salaries to military men and reduce only the salaries of those engaged in the civil departments, and upon these questions I ask that the Senate now vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire whether the amendment is not separable. I should like a vote taken on the first clause separately. I think it is.

Mr. BOREMAN and others. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is separable, I should like a vote taken on the first clause first.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

Provided, That the salaries of all officers of the Army and Navy, whose pay is $2,000 per annum or more, and that the salaries of Government officers and employés, and heads of Departments, and of all who receive pay of $2,000 or more from the Government Treasury, and whose salaries are not fixed by the Constitution, be, and the same are hereby, reduced in the same ratio, at the rate of 25 per cent., calculated upon the full pay and all allowances now paid under law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that this is one proposition and not divisible. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. As an amendment to the bill from the House, I shall vote for this proposition, so as to avoid all misconception in the future; but as an original proposition I do not know that I should vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GORDON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to make a speech, but we can test this question just as well in another way. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the provision for the reduction of the pay of the officers of the Army and Navy; and we can take the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the amendment by striking out the reduction of pay of officers of the Army and Navy.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order. Is not this an amendment in the third degree?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. It is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let my amendment be reported, so that we may understand exactly what we are voting upon.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to strike out the words,

That the salaries of officers of the Army and Navy whose pay is $2,000 per annum or more.

Mr. MORTON. I shall vote against the motion of my friend from Vermont for the reason that by striking it out, so far as the military are concerned, we seem to favor the passage of the proposition so far as civil officers are concerned. I shall vote against the whole proposition. Some salaries may be too high, both military and civil; but this proposition is too indiscriminate; it strikes at all. Some salaries are now perhaps not too high; some may not be high enough; others may be too high; but this proposition strikes at all alike. I agree with my friend from Iowa that we should not embarrass the passage of this salary bill by undertaking a general regulation of salaries, military and civil. I think that would be better undertaken as a separate matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This forces me to say a single word. My friend from Indiana is entirely wrong in supposing that voting for this amendment of mine to strike out the proposition as to the Army and Navy, it is a vote in favor of reducing the others at their expense. By no means; but it is the usual, and in the case of this amendment, as the Chair has decided, and rightly I think, the only possible means of having a separate vote upon the proposition to reduce the pay of the several departments of the Government as a sweeping thing. I am ready for an inquiry into the compensation of all the officers of the Government, but I am not ready in this way to declare by one sweeping and indiscriminate stroke that no man who has served this country as some men have, who go upon crutches now and get the sum of $2,000 a year or upward, shall be entitled to hold it any longer.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, and Tipton—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Crozier, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pratt, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Sumner, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Ames, Anthony, Cameron, Fenton, Johnston, Jones Ramsey, Robertson, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman—12.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. If I can get the attention of the Senate I want to make a proposition. ["Too late."]

Mr. SPEER. I observe that the chairman of the Committee on Elections [Mr. SMITH, of New York] is now absent; and I ask that if the order suggested by my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] be adopted, an exception be made so that the Committee on Elections may make a report to-morrow for the purpose of having it printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that we may meet to-morrow, and go on with the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. We can probably finish it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The order suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be made only by unanimous consent; and the Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as objecting.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour now begins at thirteen minutes past twelve o'clock; and this being Friday, the committees will be called for reports of a private nature.

THOMAS HILLHOUSE.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 253) for the relief of Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States in New York City.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers to allow Thomas Hillhouse, assistant treasurer of the United States at New York City, in the settlement of his internal-revenue-stamp account, a credit for the sum of $185,000, being the proceeds of sale of internal-revenue stamps embezzled by James I. Johnson, a clerk in his office, without the default or negligence of the assistant treasurer.

Mr. HOLMAN. From what committee does this bill come?

The SPEAKER. It is reported from the Committee on Ways and Means by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe it is not subject to any point of order now. The reason why I should desire to make such a point is that I do not think the bill ought to have gone to that committee. The Committee on Ways and Means are constituted for the consideration of more important questions of a general nature, and so long as they are charged with the examination of these little claims so long will there be a lack of correctness and uniformity in the adjustment of claims.

The old practice which so long prevailed is the only safe one, and that is to refer all of these claims to the committee especially charged with their consideration, so that some uniform rule may be adopted. They should all go to the committee responsible for that particular branch of the legislative business of the country. Then there would be some certainty in regard to the action of this House of Representatives. But when a committee like the Committee on Ways and Means report on private claims, which have to do with the great questions of the country, and by whom, from the very nature of the business before them, questions of this kind cannot and will not receive proper consideration, it seems to me that considerations of policy should demand that report should not have the same confidence, no matter how high the character of the several gentlemen on that committee may be, as if the report came from the committee properly charged with such duties. It affords me great pleasure to say that there is no committee of the House in whose judgment I have more respect and confidence than the Committee on Ways and Means, when its action is confined to matters properly before it for consideration under the rules of the House.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to second every word which has been said by the gentleman from Indiana. No more appropriate remarks could be made to the House than those which have just fallen from his lips. If there is anything which embarrasses the action of the House more than another it is the conflict of jurisdiction between the several committees, growing out of inadvertent references, not growing out of the special and just jurisdiction provided by the rules themselves.

I wish in this connection to call attention to a very singular fact illustrating this. On the last day before the recess there was a public discussion in the House over a private claim, when the House indicated clearly that that private claim—and I will say that I refer to the Chorpenning claim—should go to the Committee on Claims or to the Committee on Appropriations, where it had been considered; but the member having it in charge withdrew it from the consideration of the House, saying he was not prepared to have it referred immediately; and then, after withdrawing it, he, unbeknown to the House, caused its reference under the rule to the Judiciary Committee—a private claim calling for the examination of witnesses.

I would say in reference to the Judiciary Committee precisely what the gentleman from Indiana has kindly said in reference to the Committee on Ways and Means. No one can have any more confidence in that committee than I have myself, and these remarks do not refer at all to the character of the committee, but simply to the habit of referring bills improperly to the different committees.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that the Chorpenning claim was referred to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly it was.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have been constantly in my seat, and I know that no such reference was made by public action of this House.

Mr. DAWES. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary under the rule by the member who had it in charge; but it was referred by him without the knowledge of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that it was not done by any public action of the House.

Mr. DAWES. When it was presented, and the gentleman made his speech, it was afterwards withdrawn, and referred under the rule to the Judiciary Committee.

Now, I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that these remarks do not bear and are not intended to reflect on the character of the committee or on the rights of the gentleman who caused that reference. I wish merely to second the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, and seize the occasion he has given for asking the members of the House to see to it that we ought not to take any action which involves conflicting jurisdiction between the committees of the House.

The reason why the particular bill under consideration came from the Committee on Ways and Means, although it is in the nature of a private claim, is this: it grew out of transactions of the sub-treasury in New York over the revenue stamps, and was referred last year to the Committee on Ways and Means. It was referred this session, without any agency on the part of any member of the Committee on Ways and Means, to that committee, because they have had general supervision of the subject of revenue stamps.

It grows out of a defalcation of one of the clerks of the sub-treasury in New York; and it was supposed, therefore, as it had been the custom in the House, whether right or wrong, to refer all claims growing out of the revenue system to the Committee on Ways and Means, that it should in this instance take that reference. No committee would be so glad as the Committee on Ways and Means to have everything of the kind go to the Committee on Claims; and this subject went to the Committee on Ways and Means without any agency on their part.

Mr. CESSNA. I beg the indulgence of the House to make a single remark.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I trust questions not relating to this bill will not be introduced in this discussion.

Mr. CESSNA. I trust I will be allowed to make one single remark, as I have been specially referred to in what has already been said. I agree fully in the remark of the gentleman from New York, that this subject, in my judgment, is not a proper one to be brought up in the discussion of the pending bill; but in order to correct what are no doubt accidental errors into which the gentleman from Massachusetts has fallen, in regard to the subject-matter referred to in his remarks on this occasion, I beg leave to call the attention of the House, as well as that of the gentleman himself, to one or two remarks made by him at the time when the subject first came up. I then said to the House that I desired some consultation before I could indicate to what committee I would send the papers.

I stated distinctly at the time that I had not presented the papers, and I therefore did not withdraw them; but I intended to present them thereafter. While I was making those remarks, a message was received from the Senate of the United States, announcing concurrence in the House resolution of adjournment. I was therefore compelled to act at once, which I did. I stated then that, in my judgment, the papers related to a question almost entirely legal in all its bearings, and not in the nature of a claim, and that therefore the Judiciary Committee was the proper committee to have charge of the claim. After I made that statement the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] answered that he had no choice in regard to the committee to which the papers should be referred; and I then stated that I would exercise my own right as to the presentation of the papers and the choice of the committee to which they should be referred. The adjournment being about to take place, I was compelled to act; and I presented the papers at the desk, as I thought I had a right to do, and as I had publicly stated that I had the right to do; and they were sent to the committee I had indicated in my remarks. I therefore, in my opinion, took no advantage of the House, and I had no intent to do so. I simply carried out my own declaration, as far as I was able to do it; and having heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts that he had no preference or choice as to the committee, I sent the papers to what I believed to be the proper committee.

Mr. DAWES. I stated that I did not design to reflect on the gentleman or his committee. I had no choice in regard to a committee. My confidence in the Judiciary Committee is as great as in any other committee of the House. I only spoke, in connection with the discussion which grew out of the pending bill, of the manifest impropriety of sending a private claim to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BECK. I want to say a word upon this subject, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS] will allow me. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] to the fact that I objected then, or tried to object, to any disposition being made of this Chorpenning claim except by the House. When I learned that after being withdrawn the papers were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I determined to move, and I wish to give notice now that at the earliest opportunity I intend to move, that the House shall take that claim from the Committee on the Judiciary and send it to a committee on which there is no one personally interested. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was sufficiently interested, and has been sufficiently attacked, to be induced to make a personal explanation on this floor relative to his connection with the matter, and he had no right, after what took place the other day, to send it to the committee where he himself would be one of the judges in the case.

Mr. CESSNA. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania assumes to perform the duties of a judge he will be prepared to answer for his conduct. The gentleman from Pennsylvania heard no objection from any gentleman to the papers being referred to the Judiciary Committee. He heard some remark on the part of the Committee on Claims and made some answer to that, but he stated distinctly his right to have the papers referred to the committee of his own choice, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not aware that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] by a single objection, would have any right to interfere with the reference.

Mr. BECK. I give notice now that at the earliest opportunity I will move to refer the claim to the Committee on Claims or the Committee on Appropriations. By its reference to the Judiciary Committee the gentleman from Pennsylvania is sitting as a judge in his own case, for he is the man being tried.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I desire to say a word on this matter.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I must decline to yield further. The pending bill was referred in the last Congress to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that committee unanimously directed that a report should be made in favor of its passage; but on account of the lateness of the day the report was not made. In this Congress the bill was referred again to the Committee on Ways and Means, and the committee unanimously directed a favorable report to be made. I regret that questions in regard to the reference of another matter about which there may be a difference of opinion should have arisen in connection with the report upon this bill, about which I think there can be no difference whatever. The loss in the office of the assistant treasurer was at the time investigated by a committtee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, and that committee reported that the loss was without fault on the part of the assistant treasurer. That report is Executive Document No. 41, made to the third session of the Forty-second Congress.

A special committee was also appointed by the last Congress, and its report, made at the third session by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] is conclusive that the relief ought to be granted. It is printed as House report No. 70, for the third session.

In this Congress again the Secretary of the Treasury, by an official letter to the Speaker of the House, recommends the passage of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the permission of the gentleman from New York I desire to say, that my sole objection was to the reference of such matters to the Committee on Ways and Means. I desire to say further, that I have been told by General Spinner, a gentleman whose statement on such a matter should be of great weight, that this relief ought to be afforded. I have no doubt that the recommendation of the committee is in accordance with the facts of the case.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that General Spinner's opinion should have great weight. With the recommendations of two Secretaries of the Treasury and the evidence before the committee, with the reports to which I have referred, the case for this bill, is irresistible.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was next on the passage of the bill; and being taken, there were—ayes 118, noes 40.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire this subject to pass from the attention of the House without a single word on his part.

There are continually arising conflicts with regard to the reference of bills, which occur, according to the observation of the Chair, from references on Monday morning to which no attention is paid by any member except the member introducing the bill. The Chair is disposed to think that many inappropriate references are made from inattention or perhaps lack of knowledge of the proper jurisdiction of the various committees, and gentlemen send many matters to various other committees which should go to the Committee on Claims. This bill, the Chair has no hesitation in saying, belongs to the Committee on Claims, although it was regularly referred to the Committee on Ways and Means; and unless some attention is given to the reference of bills on Monday morning, or unless the various committees conceive it to be a point of honor to report back such bills as are wrongly referred to them, there will continually arise these questions of jurisdiction, which ought never to occur in the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to inquire if it would be in order within twenty-four hours to move to reconsider a reference made at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER. It would not be, because the rule is that bills referred on Monday morning shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is not the point I make. This Chorpenning claim was referred at the Clerk's desk, and not on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. That is not the question under consideration now. The Chair knows nothing about any mode of reconsidering the presentation of petitions. A gentleman presenting a petition ordinarily indicates the committee to which he wishes it to be referred. If he indicates a wrong committee the Chair has no hesitation in saying that the committee to which it is referred should report it back.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not possible for the Chair to correct errors of that sort.

The SPEAKER. It is not possible for the Chair to do it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The Chair has not answered the inquiry I made. It is the practice here to refer petitions at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and a gentleman can indicate to what committee a petition shall be referred. My inquiry is whether it is in order any time within twenty-four hours after that reference to move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; the remedy lies in the committee to which it is referred doing its duty if it is wrongly referred. The Chair observes every Monday morning numerous references that are wrong, but it is not the province of the Chair, nor within his power to correct them. It gives rise to disagreeable questions as to the proper jurisdiction of committees which never ought to arise here. The Chair does not know of any mode of reconsidering the reference of a petition to a committee.

Mr. COBURN. I think the difficulty arises in great part from the fact that petitions, memorials, and bills are put into that box in front of the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. No bills are put there but post-route bills.

Mr. COBURN. I think that sometimes petitions with accompanying papers, including bills, are put in there.

The SPEAKER. That is not practically worse than a Monday morning reference. Just as much attention is given to a petition put into that box as to a bill referred on Monday.

Mr. BECK. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I ask whether, if a bill or petition has been referred to a wrong committee, there is any other mode to correct the misreference except by moving to suspend the rules on Monday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any.

Mr. BECK. Can that be done?

The SPEAKER. It can be done. The Chair observes on every Monday that bills proposing to reimburse postmasters for lost postage-stamps are referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; that bills for the relief of officers who have lost horses are referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; that bills for the relief of gentlemen who have claims against the Naval Department are referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, when they all belong under the rules to the Committee on Claims, and undoubtedly belong there.

ABEL GILBERT AND WILLIAM GERRISH.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the name style of Gilbert & Gerrish; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the sum of $26,250 to Benjamin W. Gilbert, administrator of the estate of said Abel Gilbert, and Isaac Watts, administrator of the estate of William Gerrish, in full accord and satisfaction for damages for violation of a grain contract entered into the 21st day of May, 1859, between Colonel G. H. Crosman, deputy quartermaster-general of the United States Army, in behalf of the United States, and said Abel Gilbert, in his own name, but in behalf of said Gilbert & Gerrish.

Mr. HOLMAN. As this bill contains an appropriation, I think, on account of the amount in it, as well as of the principle involved, it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say for the information of the House, and in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that this bill passed the House during the last Congress, some months, I think, before the close of the session, and also passed the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not waive the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The bill passed the Senate the last night of the session, too late to receive the signature of the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes the point of order that this bill contains an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to reserve that point of order; but I trust the Chair will hear the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will, then, continue what I was about to say when interrupted. This bill passed both Houses of Congress during the last session, but passed the Senate at the close of the session, too late to receive the signature of the President. It has at this session received the consideration of the Committee on Claims of the House, and has the unanimous approval of that committee. I think no claim could be presented to the House that could appeal more strongly to Congress for relief than this.

The bill is accompanied by a long report, setting forth the grounds on which the claim rests, and the reasons for the passage of the bill. I shall not ask to have that long report read unless it be insisted on by some gentleman desiring further information. I hope, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the claim is a just one, that it has passed both Houses of Congress at previous sessions, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will not insist on its being sent to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, where it may not be reached during the present session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to say a word on this subject. I hold in my hand a proposition which I desire to submit to the House as early as possible, providing for adding the following amendment to the rules:

> All private bills making appropriations of property or money, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall first be considered in a Committee of the Whole House; and no such bill shall be considered on the day of its commitment.

I make the point of order with the more freedom on this particular bill because, from the full discussion upon it in committee at the last session, I understand its nature; and I indorse substantially what the gentleman has said in regard to it. It was before the Committee on Claims in the last Congress; a very careful report was made upon it, and it passed the House without objection. But, sir, having observed the evils resulting from the too rapid action of the House on private claims, where no point is made against them, the gentleman, I think, must see the importance of such a rule as I have suggested, providing that such claims, when brought before the House, shall lie over one day. I trust I shall have the co-operation of the gentleman in the adoption of the proposition I have read. I desire to do no injustice; but this being the very beginning of the session, and the precedent being important, I must insist on my objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] He stands here and states that at the last Congress, during the whole of which he was a member of the Committee on Claims, this very bill was before that committee, and he knows it to be a just claim; yet in the face of that statement he desires now to make a point of order upon it for the purpose of sending it to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. What I said was that the subject had been thoroughly discussed, and that I indorsed, in the main, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I stated that the bill was a just one and ought to be passed; so that, when the gentleman indorsed what I said, he indorsed that statement; and I understand him to do so now. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes, sir. I have already stated to the gentleman that I should have to insist upon it. If I should consent to this bill going through I could not, in consistency and justice, make the point upon similar bills hereafter.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If the gentleman insists on his point of order I suppose the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that when a point of order is made it should be decided at once. There is no necessity for debating it. The bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The point of order was not made until this moment. The gentleman from Indiana reserved the right to make the point until after I had made my statement, and after that statement he made the point.

Mr. SPEAKER. When a gentleman permits a point of order to be discussed he thereby waives the point.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understood the Chair to say that the point could be reserved.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And that was done in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood; otherwise the discussion could not have gone on.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to know whether the gentleman, by anything that has occurred, has lost the right to make the point.

The SPEAKER. He has not lost the right, because unanimous consent was given that he should reserve the point; but he had no right under the rules to have it reserved.

GEORGE M. RICHARD.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 215) to exempt George M. Richard, of Pittston, in the State of Pennsylvania, from the payment of $900 for postage-stamps stolen from his office while postmaster.

The bill was read.

Mr. SPEER. I hope my colleague will give the House a statement of this case.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I was just about to do so; but first I will send up the report to be read.

The Clerk read the report. It states that, on the night of March 19, 1873, the office of George M. Richard, postmaster at Pittston, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, was entered by burglars, and his safe, containing postage-stamps, was blown open and robbed. The safe and doors of the office were properly locked and secured on the evening of the robbery; and no negligence is charged on the postmaster. These statements are sustained by affidavits of the postmaster, his two clerks, and the occupants of the premises adjoining the post-office building. The postmaster, from the average daily sales of January and February, estimates the amount of stamps in his office at the time at $926.12; while the Post-Office Department, estimating from the average daily sales for seventy-nine days previous to December 31, 1872, concludes the amount of stamps in the office at the time of the robbery to have been $881.29. The committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment fixing the latter amount as the credit to be allowed to the postmaster.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I ask also that a letter from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1873.

SIR: In compliance with the request in your letter of yesterday, I herewith transmit the affidavits and other papers received from George M. Richard, late postmaster at Pittston, Pennsylvania, relative to the robbery of his post-office by burglars on the night of the 19th of March, 1873.

An estimate of the amount of postage-stamps and stamped envelopes on hand at the office, on the date of the alleged robbery, is as follows:

Amount on hand on the 31st of December, 1872, (as per returns to the Auditor)	$701 32
Sent on orders, from January 1 to March 19, 1873	1,394 20
Total,	2,095 52
Deduct estimated sales for 79 days, (average daily sales for two quarters ending December 31, 1873, being $15.37)	1,214 23
Leaving the probable amount on hand March 19th, 1873	881 29

or $112.88 less than the amount claimed to have been stolen.

Respectfully, &c.,

E. W. BARBER,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. L. D. SHOEMAKER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole, and I desire to make that motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I object; it is not in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the motion, not the point of order.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. I do not yield for that purpose. I call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question, and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that there shall be a full vote on this question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SHOEMAKER of Pennsylvania and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 125, noes 20.

So the previous question was seconded; and the main question was then ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment to reduce the amount from $900 to $881.29; and being taken, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET E. WEST.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 62) for the relief of Margaret E. West; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES CLINTON.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the bill (H. R. No. 308) for the relief of Charles Clinton, late assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, Louisiana.

The committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was laid upon the table, and the report accompanying it was ordered to be printed.

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the accounts of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, and allow him the sum of $706.56, being the amount paid for salaries of keepers and assistant keepers of light-houses for the first quarter of the year 1861.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not this bill make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It involves an appropriation of money.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I make the point of order that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill will be referred accordingly.

COLONEL E. M'CARTY.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1039) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Colonel E. McCarty, of Illinois, the sum of $1,450, being the amount paid by him to the Government on a direct-tax sale by the judgment of the United States court, and for which payment of money the said Colonel E. McCarty received no consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this bill contains an appropriation, and must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill will be referred accordingly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The Committee on Claims have no further reports to make this morning.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit to the House, for reference to the Committee on the Rules, an amendment to the rules, the substance of which has been approved by the Committee on War Claims, but the precise form is suggested by the Journal Clerk of the House. I desire by the approval of the Committee on War Claims merely to have it referred.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I object to the morning hour being used for this purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will take but a moment.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I must object.

JOHN B. WEBER.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1039) for the relief of John B. Weber, late colonel Eighteenth Infantry, Corps d'Afrique; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Paymaster-General of the Army to allow and pay to John B. Weber, late colonel Eighteenth Infantry, Corps d'Afrique, out of the appropriations for the pay of the Army, the pay and allowance of a first lieutenant from the 28th of September, 1863, until the 8th of November of the same year, being from the time he received his commission as such officer until the time he was mustered into the service, provided that he has not been paid for his services for that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill require the payment of money out of an appropriation heretofore made? I think it is a claim which belongs to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Paid out of the appropriation for the pay of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill itself does not make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does not make a direct appropriation.

The report accompanying the bill was ordered to be printed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALBRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

H. E. TINKHAM.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely on the petition of H. E. Tinkham, of Freetown, Bristol County, Massachusetts, who, having served in the Navy during the late war, prays to be placed on the retired list of the Navy; and the same was laid on the table.

PENSIONERS OF WAR OF 1812.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 469) to restore pensioners of the war of 1812, the Mexican war, and other wars, who forfeited their pension by participating in the rebellion, to the pension-rolls; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

WILLIAM MOORE.

Mr. RUSK. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 810) for the relief of William Moore, late private in Company K, Seventy-third Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. COBURN. Bills for paying bounty should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, and so ought bills referring to the pay of officers and soldiers. As I understand it, the Committee on War Claims has, under the rules, jurisdiction over claims for property taken or destroyed during the war.

The SPEAKER. The reference suggested by the gentleman from Indiana is a proper reference.

Mr. RUSK. Let it be referred, then, to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make that amendment of my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. CAROLINE M'GHEE.

Mr. RUSK. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to move that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mrs. Caroline McGhee, widow of Leonard McGhee, Company F, Second Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, praying for a pension; and that the same be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. COBURN. That seems to be for a pension.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that bill?

Mr. RUSK. It is a claim, and does not belong to the Pension Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it has a wrong title.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be a petition for a pension; and, if it is not, it is improperly indorsed.

Mr. COBURN. What is the claim for?

The SPEAKER. It seems to be for certain services rendered the Union Army in East Tennessee.

Mr. COBURN. If it be to pay for services, then it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a claim against the Government, and certainly does not belong to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it belongs to the Committee on War Claims, but to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is simply a claim, and not a claim growing out of the war.

Mr. COBURN. I supposed it was a claim by some officer or soldier for services rendered.

The SPEAKER. It is a claim of the widow of a man who lost his life in certain alleged services, and not as an officer.

Mr. COBURN. I withdraw my motion to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from further consideration of the subject, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS, ET AL.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Phillips et al., for a special act to place the name of Stephen Phillips on the rolls of Company K, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. This has been once referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and then to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but the Chair thinks, instead of going to the Committee on War Claims, it should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RUSK. I make that modification of my motion.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the following bills; and the same were referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812:

A bill (H. R. No. 570) to amend the pension act of February 14, 1871, by striking out "proof of loyalty;"

A bill (H. R. No. 484) granting pensions to the survivors of the war of 1812, or their widows, where the term of service exceeded fourteen days; and

A bill (H. R. No. 286) granting a pension to Mary Horton, of Franklin County, Alabama.

WAR CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. WARD, of Illinois, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 353) for the relief of certain citizens of the counties of Jackson, Cass, Bates, and Vernon, in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

CLAIMS OF MISSOURI CITIZENS.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 355) referring certain claims of loyal citizens of the State of Missouri to the Court of Claims of the United States, and for other purposes; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT TERMS IN IOWA.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 179) to change the time of holding certain terms of the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be instructed to consider the expediency of adopting the following rule:

All references at the Clerk's desk shall be published in the next issue of the official report of the proceedings of the House, with the name of the Member or Delegate requesting the reference, and of the committee to which the reference is made; and at any time during the next legislative day after such reference any member may make a point of order as to the propriety of such reference, and upon such point of order being made the Speaker shall determine, without debate, the proper reference to be made.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the following resolution be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be amended by adding at the end of Rule 112 the following:

And all private bills making appropriations of property or money, or requiring such appropriation to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first considered in Committee of the Whole House; and no such bill shall be considered on the day of its commitment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. GARFIELD said: I trust the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] will withdraw his objection, and allow the amendment to the rules proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to be introduced for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that the rule requires that no amendment of the rules shall be considered in the House without one day's notice. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] will observe that an objection to a reference to the Committee on the Rules does not in any way estop the committee from considering it. The reading of the proposed amendment in open House is a notice. So it may as well be referred.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, Mr. HOLMAN'S resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour never expires until a privileged question closes it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I rise to make a privileged motion. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to make a motion which I believe, as this is private-bill day, has preference over the motion of the gentleman from Maine. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a motion which I believe is of higher privilege than either of those two motions.

Mr. BECK. I have a resolution for reference to the Committee on the Rules, which I ask may be read before the question is taken on any of those motions.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen have made privileged motions. They must yield before the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky can be entertained.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have no objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky being read.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so amended as to authorize any committee to which petitions, memorials, and bills may be referred, under the rules, at the Clerk's desk, by a member, to send such matters as in their opinion should have been referred to some other committee directly to that committee, without bringing the subject before the House for its action.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have a resolution on the same subject, which I desire to have referred to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have more rules now than we observe. [Laughter.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I offer the following resolution for reference:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules consider the expediency of so amending the rules as to authorize the Speaker to decide, subject to appeal, the question to which committee of the House any bill or resolution introduced shall be referred at the time of its original introduction: Provided, That he may submit the question to the House if he see fit.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. I desire to have the question settled whether we are to have a session to-morrow or not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. We have just got back here after the holiday recess, and should attend to the public business. If we go on with the naval appropriation bill to-day and to-morrow I think we can finish it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by gentlemen from the State of New York and the State of Michigan that it is the intention of those giving the notices to bring to the attention of the House the deaths of members from those States to-day at three o'clock.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then I certainly hope, if the Committee on Appropriations can only go on until three o'clock to-day, that the House will give us to-morrow for work.

The SPEAKER. The question is not debatable.

The question being put on Mr. MAYNARD's motion, there were—ayes 91, noes 69.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I must call for the yeas and nays upon this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not consume the public time by insisting on the yeas and nays. Let us have the question tested by tellers.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I hope the public time will not be consumed by the adoption of this motion. It is because time is precious that I insist upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to state to the House that the estimates made by the Secretary of the Navy have not yet been printed.

Mr. RANDALL. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I object to debate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief statement.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 44.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 119, not voting 39; as follows:

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 21) for the relief of aged or infirm pre-emption settlers.

Also that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill of the House (H. R. No. 434) making an appropriation for the legislative expenses of Colorado Territory.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House that to-morrow we meet as in Committee of the Whole for debate alone.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object; if we cannot meet to work do not let us meet at all.

PATENT AND COPYRIGHT LAWS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1040) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights," approved July 8, 1870; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill. That will give the House one hour's work on the bill. I certainly hope, as the Committee on Appropriations has got its bills in readiness and desires to go on with this, the most important of all the public business, at once, and in view of the fact that a day has been cut out, the House will give the committee the time between now and three o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I just want to say to the gentleman from Maine that we are not here under drill-sergeants. We will give the committee fair time, but we do not wish this thing pushed down our throats all the time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is very well for the gentleman to talk about drill-sergeants, and to claim that he will give, so far as he is concerned, good time to the consideration of the appropriation bills, but the best way in which he can prove it is by voting in accordance with what he states.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall vote upon each occasion as I deem best.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This being private-bill day, and some bills having been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I desire to move that the House resolve itself into that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion would take precedence of that of the gentleman from Maine if he had made the exception when the naval appropriation bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made a special order. No such exception having been made, the motion of the gentleman from Maine will first be put.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. At the time the appropriation bill was reported, no bills had been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. But now there are several bills on the Private Calendar which were referred this morning upon points of order made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] Friday and Saturday being the only private-bill days in the week, I think we should consider these bills to-day.

The SPEAKER. Should the House refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] to submit his motion.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HALE of Maine; and upon a division there were—ayes 68, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE of Maine and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 65, noes 99.

So the motion was not agreed to.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to withdraw my objection to a session being held to-morrow for debate only, as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. PELHAM. I renew the objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SCOFIELD in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

ABEL GILBERT AND WILLIAM GERRISH.

The first bill upon the Private Calendar was House bill No. 1038, for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $26,250 to Benjamin W. Gilbert, administrator of the estate of said Abel Gilbert, and Isaac Watts, administrator of the estate of William Gerrish, in full accord and satisfaction for damages for violation of a grain contract entered into the 21st day of May, 1859, between Colonel G. H. Crosman, deputy quartermaster-general of the United States Army, in behalf of the United States, and said Abel Gilbert, in his own name, but in behalf of said Gilbert & Gerrish.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I am a little rusty in the rules. I desire to inquire if this is objection day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month the Calendar of Private Bills shall be called over, (the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to this bill. The object of the rule is to give time to examine all these bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the objection of the gentleman; this is the second Friday of the month.

Mr. HOLMAN. I forgot; I thought it was the first. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not object to the report being read if the gentleman from Indiana insists upon it. But it is well known to him what the report is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course I insist upon the report being read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac Watts, administrator of the estate of William Gerrish, asking damages on account of an annulment of a contract of Abel Gilbert, of the firm of Gilbert & Gerrish, have considered the same, and ask leave to report:

The following is a statement of the facts in this case, as they appear upon the records in the office of the Quartermaster-General, and not denied by either party:

On the 21st of May, 1859, a contract was entered into at Salt Lake City, between Colonel George H. Crosman, deputy quartermaster-general United States Army, and Abel Gilbert, according to the terms of which the latter was to supply the army of General Johnston, then stationed at Camp Floyd, Utah, with forty thousand bushels of wheat, rye, barley, corn, and oats, in equal or unequal portions of each, at the option of the parties, and for which Colonel Crosman was to pay $2 per bushel for the wheat, rye, barley, and corn, and $1.50 per bushel for the oats; and the contract expressly reserved to the United States the privilege of increasing the quantity of grain to be delivered to one hundred thousand bushels at any time within fifteen days from the date of the contract. Within the time stipulated, Colonel Crosman notified Gilbert that he would be required to deliver one hundred thousand bushels. The contract was, therefore, for the delivery of one hundred thousand bushels. This grain was to be delivered by Gilbert to the United States at points not more distant from Camp Floyd than the town of Manti, San Pete Valley. But the contract further provided that if Colonel Crosman should require the grain to be delivered at Camp Floyd, Gilbert was to receive $2.50 per bushel for corn, rye, wheat, and barley, and $2 per bushel for oats. Payments were to be made from time to time, as the grain was delivered, or as funds were received by the Quartermaster-General. The whole of the grain was to be delivered, at the convenience of Gilbert, between the 1st of July, 1859, and the 1st of June, 1860, not less than ten thousand bushels to be constantly kept on hand at Camp Floyd.

Gilbert received notice from Colonel Crosman to deliver the grain at Camp Floyd, instead of the points mentioned in the first article of the contract, and, in accordance therewith, commenced the execution of the contract, by delivering the grain at Camp Floyd, and delivered a large quantity of grain at that point, which was received and paid for, and he was proceeding in the execution of his contract, when, in the winter of 1859, or late in the fall of 1859, he was requested by General Johnston and Colonel Crosman to discontinue further deliveries of grain except in small quantities, from time to time, as needed for issue, they stating that the number of mules had been largely reduced, three thousand having been sold at auction, and that there was no room in the store-houses for more grain at that time.

To this Gilbert assented, with the understanding, as Colonel Crosman says, that there would be no objection to extending the time for completing his contract into another year. Accordingly, on the 17th day of April, 1860, an agreement was entered into between Colonel Crosman and Gilbert, by which the time for the delivery of the grain was extended from the 1st day of June, 1860, to the 30th day of June, 1861, Gilbert having at that date, (April 17, 1860,) executed about one-half of his contract.

This change in the contract, as abundantly appears by the statements of Colonel Crosman, was made for the convenience of the Government and for its benefit, at the instance of Colonel Crosman. Gilbert did not seek the change. On the contrary, it appears that he was ready to continue the delivery of grain and complete the contract.

On the 14th of July, 1860, three months nearly after the agreement extending the time for the delivery of the grain had been made, General J. E. Johnston, Quartermaster-General, wrote to Colonel Crosman, informing him that the said agreement changing the time of delivery had been disapproved and annulled by the Secretary of War, on the ground that there were no sureties to guarantee its fulfillment, and that the competition required by the regulations had not been invited, and directing Colonel Crosman to inform Mr. Gilbert of his action. To this letter Colonel Crosman replied, remonstrating against such action, and explaining that the agreement of April 17, 1860, was not a new contract for grain, but merely one extending the time for the completion of the original contract, which had been made at his instance for the convenience and benefit of the Government, and urging that Mr. Gilbert be permitted to complete his contract.

It appears from the records that the original contract with Gilbert was made after advertisement, according to regulations for proposals to furnish the grain had been made, and that Gilbert's was the lowest bid of fifteen, a majority of which ranged from four to six dollars a bushel, one being as high as thirteen dollars, and that both that contract and the one extending the time for its completion were approved by the commander of that department, General Johnston. It also appears that there were approved sureties to the first contract, and that those sureties consented to the extension of time by the second.

Regarding, then, the agreement of April 17, 1860, as merely an extension of time for the completion of the original contract made at the instance of the Government, and for its benefit, there seems to be no force in the reasons given by the Secretary for disapproving it. That the second agreement was, by its terms, and was intended so to be by both Colonel Crosman and Mr. Gilbert, is conclusively shown by the record.

On the 17th day of August, 1860, four months after the second agreement was made, and while Gilbert was actively engaged in supplying the grain called for by the contract, Colonel Crosman notifies him of the action of the Secretary of War, and informs him that no more grain will be received from him on the contract.

Mr. Gilbert protested against this violation of the contract, and gave notice of his readiness to comply with his part of the contract by delivering the full quantity of grain required to fill it, representing that he had already purchased the grain, and if it was not received the loss would be ruinous to him. He tendered the grain to Major Clary, then chief of the quartermaster's department of Utah, and Major Clary, under the instructions from the War Department, declined to receive it. Mr. Gilbert then appealed to the Secretary of War to reconsider his action, but in vain. Finally, in November, 1860, the Secretary of War referred the question of the validity of the contract to the Attorney-General for his opinion, who decided that the contract was valid and binding upon the parties; that it had clearly been violated by the Government, and the contractor was entitled to damages; and suggested that the most equitable course would be to permit the contractor to execute the agreement. Mr. Gilbert then again offered to deliver the grain, but the Quartermaster-General declined to receive it, on the ground that they had all the grain that would be needed. Again and again did Mr. Gilbert propose to complete the contract, but his offers were declined. There is not in the record the slightest intimation that Mr. Gilbert failed in any respect to comply with his contract, but the Secretary of War had annulled the contract, and there he let it rest, notwithstanding the opinion of the Attorney-General.

It appears that there were delivered by Mr. Gilbert on the contract 60,976 bushels, leaving yet to be delivered 39,024 bushels.

After the contract with Gilbert was annulled, a new contract was made by the Government with another party for the grain.

From the evidence submitted by the claimants, it appears that at the time Mr. Gilbert received notice of the annulment of his contract by the Secretary of War, in the middle of August, 1860, he had purchased and had on hand at Camp Floyd, ready for delivery under the contract, about thirty-five thousand bushels of the grain, which had cost him an average of about $1.50 per bushel; that after the crop of 1860, which was an abundant one, was harvested, the prices of all grain declined very rapidly, as grain was very plenty and the demand for it quite limited, and that he lost on the grain on hand in August, 1860, which he had bought to deliver on the contract, from seventy-five cents to one dollar per bushel by the decline of prices alone, to say nothing of the expense of storing and caring for it, transporting it to a market, &c.; that after the harvest of 1860 grain sold in Utah, at market prices, for from fifty to seventy-five cents per bushel, and that thousands of bushels of sound corn, which had been transported from the Missouri River by the Government, was sold by the Government at Camp Floyd early in the summer of 1861 at twenty-five cents per bushel; that the prices of grain in 1859 and the early part of 1860 were high, ranging from $1.75 to $2 per bushel, and that Mr. Gilbert made very little, if anything, on the grain which he delivered on the contract, by reason of the high prices and the large expense attending business in that country; that Abel Gilbert was a member of the firm of Gilbert & Gerrish, and that the said firm was greatly embarrassed financially and bankrupted by the violation of this contract by the Government.

Although this contract was made in the individual name of Abel Gilbert, it appears that he was acting for the firm which was composed of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish. Mr. Gerrish died in 1865, and is represented by Isaac Watts, the administrator of his estate, and Mr. Gilbert died in 1871, and is represented by Benjamin W. Gilbert, his administrator.

Wherefore, they recommend the payment to these legal representatives of the estates of said Gilbert and Gerrish, as damages, seventy-five cents a bushel loss on thirty-five thousand bushels of grain, amounting to $26,250, providing said sum shall be received in full satisfaction for all damages sustained by said estates for breach of said contract, and for that propose the enactment of the accompanying bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think that by this time the committee understand the character of this bill, and will see that the relief proposed to be given is proper and just. I will say further, repeating somewhat what I said when the bill was up in the House this morning, that it received, as I understand, the unanimous approval of the Committee on Claims of this House of the last Congress, which committee adopted the report exactly as read in the hearing of the committee now. The bill passed the Senate in the expiring hours of the session, but failed to be signed by the President for want of time.

The bill is again reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims of this House. I do not know that I could add anything to what is said in the report to show the propriety of the passage of this bill. I will say this, however: that I believe every member of the Committee on Claims of the present Congress is of the opinion that the amount proposed to be given by this bill is not at all adequate to the damages sustained by the parties; that the damages they sustained were much greater. But this bill having passed both Houses of the last Congress, in the exact form now presented, it was deemed proper by the committee to present the same bill here. If there be no further objections to it I move that it be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. A word before the bill is laid aside. I take it for granted that this bill will pass. I think our experience of late years has been that when a measure of this kind of any plausibility comes before the House its passage is a foregone conclusion. The number of claims against the Government has been enormously increased, especially war claims and claims connected with the military operations of the Government. The number of claims of all kinds against the Government introduced into this Congress is beyond all precedent. I think there are more claims now pending before committees of this House than ever before, even the first year after the war.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that there is a disposition to question the right of members on this floor to throw reasonable obstacles in the way of the passage of these bills.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman does not make that intimation in regard to myself; for I have given him the floor every time he has sought it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am indebted to the gentleman from Illinois for his courtesy. Though of course I am now entitled to the floor in my own right, I must say that the gentleman has always acted courteously, so far as I am aware, toward his fellow-members. But the general sentiment here is that obstruction to the passage of private bills is not to be encouraged. Such opposition is considered as rather discreditable on the part of members. Now I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that, only thirteen years ago, in a time of profound peace, and always before that time for years and years, when the only claims presented to the Government were those incident to a time of peace, it was deemed so important to sift carefully these one-sided proceedings (for these cases are all ex parte) that all of them went to the Committee of the Whole.

When I came here (and that was not many years ago) no member thought of bringing in a bill of this kind and putting it on its passage at once. Such bills were always referred to the Committee of the Whole; and when the House was in committee for their consideration the seats on both sides of the House were full of attentive members watching the hundreds of cases pending for consideration. Every member of the House regarded it as part of his duty to see that such claims were carefully considered, remembering all the time that the cases were ex parte, that active, energetic, and shrewd agents on the one hand had prepared the cases, while the Government had had no voice in the preparation of proofs. Such was the practice at that time. Gentlemen of the finest talents on both sides of the House devoted earnest attention to the examination and consideration of these cases, and the reading of the printed reports. Now, it is deemed, I think, somewhat discreditable—it places a gentleman in a rather unpleasant position with reference to the House—if he throws any obstacle at all in the way of the prompt depletion of the Treasury by the payment of claims in these ex-parte cases.

Entertaining the highest respect for the gentlemen composing the committees that examine these private claims, regarding them as wholly equal in integrity and capacity to their predecessors, I must remind my friend from Illinois that not only are these cases made up entirely ex parte, without any participation by the Government in the preparation of the proofs, but the examination in this House is conducted practically by a single member. We talk about "unanimous reports" of committees, but we know that such reports must be in most cases the conclusions of a single member, and that, too, upon an ex-parte case. He states to the committee as a whole the substance of the conclusion, he has reached; he has to do it very briefly, as a matter of course; and the committee, if the general principles involved are in harmony with their practice, accept the action of the single member as sufficient. It is impossible that each member of a committee shall take up and examine the proofs in each case. Yet, sir, it is impossible to conceive of any class of claims that may be more justly regarded as ex parte than the private claims presented here against the Government.

Although not so long a member of this House as many other gentlemen here, I have had considerable experience in connection with these claims against the Government; and I have frequently found that the persons most interested in these claims are claim agents. Only last evening a gentleman called upon me—an old gentleman borne down with years—who a year or two ago succeeded in obtaining $16,000 upon a claim of $32,000; in other words, about half of the amount had been paid out to claim agents in this city. Indeed, this business is largely carried on for the benefit of claim agents.

Sir, there is everything to incite, not only each member having charge of these claims, but each member of the House, to a most careful examination of them; so that whether or not I may raise obstacles to their passage, I shall feel under great obligation to every gentleman here who will undertake to see that such bills shall receive full and scrutinizing consideration; and I trust that the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of this very important Committee of Claims, will not consent again that a claim shall be taken up for consideration before the report in the case is printed, so that members may not be compelled to depend for their information upon the uncertain voice of the Clerk in the midst of the confusion prevailing too often in this House on private-bill day, but that members desiring to understand claims upon which allowances are to be made out of the Treasury may have before them in print the report itself.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] declares that these private claims are on the increase, rapidly so, and that great caution must be exercised in acting upon them. Now they are on the increase beyond any manner of doubt. The war increased them in the proportion of one to one hundred. Now, so long as the Government dares not allow itself to be sued in the courts of the United States, where it has its own attorneys, where there would be no ex-parte statements, but where every case would have a fair, impartial, complete trial; so long, I say, as the Government dares not allow claimants against it for violated contracts to go to the courts of the United States, so long we must expect that Congress, the only body authorized to consider these claims, shall have them before it in superabundance.

Now, sir, take the claims that were before the Committee on Claims last session. Some of them were bad undoubtedly; some were good beyond question. Take this identical claim: I examined it at the last Congress with the utmost care. I found that the Government of the United States through its officers had made in writing a contract binding on the United States as well as on the other party; but when the Government found it convenient to violate the contract it had deliberately entered into with these individuals, it violated it without hesitation. The grain for which the Government had contracted to pay these men $1.75 a bushel was thrown back upon their hands, and was bought by the Government within the next month for about one-half that price, because the price of grain had fallen. Now if grain had gone up, instead of going down, the officers of the United States would have demanded of Gilbert & Gerrish that they should furnish every bushel they had contracted to deliver. But the price fell, and the Government deliberately violated its contract. Its own Attorney-General declared in writing that it had done so; that the Government was in the wrong, and ought to afford to these men the remedy to which they were entitled.

If it had not been the Government of the United States, if it had been the chairman of this committee or any other private individual who violated this contract, Gilbert & Gerrish would years ago have gone to the courts and recovered twice or three times what the committee has decided to allow to them; they would have received this money long ago, and would have been saved from bankruptcy, perhaps from death; for after becoming bankrupts they both died, I understand, broken down in health by their troubles.

But this great nation of ours, having the power to violate contracts, does it deliberately, and says that no court of the country shall be open to the party injured, but that he must come to the Congress of the United States. And, sir, these claimants are all compelled to come to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of my friend from Maine whether the Secretary of War was not invested at that time, and whether he is not still invested, with the necessary power to furnish the very relief which this bill contemplates if the claim grew out of, as my friend thinks it did, any violation of contract on the part of the Government. Now, does it not occur to my friend that the Secretary of War could have furnished relief, if the case was as strong as it is claimed to be upon the papers, if they had been submitted to him for examination? Is it not, then, a case not within the scope of the duties of the Committee on Claims, but rather belonging under the law to the Secretary of War?

Mr. FRYE. I will say that these officers of the Government violated this contract within a year or two of the time when this country was plunged into a rebellion which made every man forget his contract, whether kept or violated. These contracts were lost at once in the terrible rebellion under which the Government was laboring. No man having a contract entered into before the war could get the ear of the Secretary of War while the rebellion was upon us, for that rebellion took up all the time of every man connected with the Government; and immediately after it these two men died. Now the time lapsed when these men were allowed to go to the officers of the Government, by limitation. They could not go to the Government. They had a remedy nowhere except the remedy they pursued here.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not have been much safer to have removed the limitation in this particular case, so that under the well-known and well-established rules of the War Department the proper accounting officers of the Treasury might be enabled to adjust this claim?

Mr. FRYE. I say no, decidedly, because the officers of the Government were the very men of whom they complain that they did deliberately construe, as no lawyer living, I do not care who he is—as no lawyer living—would construe a legal contract and the powers under it; that they so construed this contract that they violated it, as they said, legally. These men should not, under the circumstances, be compelled to go back to the very officers of the law who gave that construction by which the contract was violated. They then came here for relief, as they had a perfect right to do. Their claim was considered in our committee. It was discussed during two sessions of the committee. The gentleman from Indiana was there; and I defy any private claimant to get any claim whatsoever, except it be for some poor soldier, through the Committee on Claims as it was, or the Committee on War Claims as it is now, so long as my brother HOLMAN was or is a member of that committee, without its being investigated to the very bottom; for he stands there, as he stands here, objecting to every single claimant who comes there. He looks upon the claimant as a pirate sailing his ship directly into the ship of the United States of America, without any right and without any justice; and immediately, in behalf of the United States, he "goes" for the pirate claimant, always and everywhere. [Laughter.]

Now I wish to say, sir, from my examination of this case, that I never knew a stronger one than this is. I say that no man, reading the evidence as I have read it, can say that this committee has allowed these claimants one-half—without interest, too—more than one-half of what any jury or any court of law in the country would have allowed them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say one thing, not on the special merits of the point made by the gentleman from Maine, but in regard to the question raised by the gentleman from Indiana. I think it a misfortune in our mode of settling claims before Congress that we have made it so difficult for claimants to get a fair, unprejudiced hearing. I mean that in exactly the language I use—that a claimant, in order to press his claim before this House and get himself fully and thoroughly heard, is compelled to employ attorneys or claim agents; and the custom of the House and the method we have adopted for doing business make it almost dishonorable for a lawyer to come before a committee of the House to present and press a claim, partly because it is a one-sided matter, and partly because it is not in the nature of a judicial proceeding. I think we shall never be right on this matter until we have an advocate for the Government, a congressional attorney, paid to serve each Congress as against every claimant who presents a claim before the Claims Committee; and the Claims Committee sitting as a court, hearing and deciding upon the matters presented to their consideration by counsel, their judgment to be examined and properly reviewed afterward on the part of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a minute. The gentleman from Ohio will bear in mind that every claimant coming before Congress with a legitimate claim against the Government could have his claim adjusted under the law at the proper Department, whether the War, the Navy, the Quartermaster's, or Commissary's Department, as the case might be; or, if not adjustable there, it could be adjusted in the Court of Claims.

The cases which come before Congress belong to the shadowy kind of claims which do not come within the tabulations of the Departments of the Government, or of the Court of Claims, or of the southern claims commission. The powers of adjustment of claims by the southern claims commission and the Court of Claims are in full operation; and these cases which come before Congress are, as I have said, of a shadowy kind, in which we may sometimes discover a species of equity; and the parties urging the claim are in a position to appeal to our sympathies with the weaker side. The result is that we deal with claims which are shadowy in their nature from the very necessity of the case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was not attacking my friend from Indiana. On the contrary I was rather defending much that he said. And I make this point again, that the trouble in all these cases is, that the claim, being in great part a one-sided matter, it has really come to be understood that a first-class attorney who cares much for his reputation keeps clear of taking cases before committees of Congress. It ought to be the most respectable and honorable form of employment that a lawyer can have—to present a claim before a grave committee of Congress, a committee appointed to sit in a judicial capacity and hear it. But the thing the gentleman said that I most thoroughly approve is this: that when, in a different manner or by different regulation, a claim has been considered by a committee, a report should be made by that committee; and if it is a claim that has any sort of complexity about it, the report ought to be in print and in the hands of members of Congress. It ought to be on our desks, so that we may understand the facts better than we can from the casual reading of the report at the desk.

Who does not remember how, at the close of almost every session, late at night, when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with two or three hundred bills on the Calendar, the man is considered almost impertinent who demands the reading of a report, and the report if read at all is read very hurriedly, consisting perhaps of ten or fifteen pages, and the vote is immediately taken. Under such circumstances who can get any reasonable idea of what is in the report?

I think the chairman of the Committee on Claims would do the country a great service if he would have a rule established, requiring as a practice in his committee that the report be in print when the committee brings a bill before the House. We would be greatly helped by that. It would facilitate the deliberation of the House on such bills and make it more real and complete.

I am glad that I have had an opportunity of making these remarks on a case that I think is good, for I have no doubt from all that I have heard that this bill ought to pass. I believe it has been carefully considered by the committee. The chairman has done his full duty in reporting it, and I am ready to vote for the bill. But I do hope that we shall have just as much elaborate and formal preparation in laying all bills of this kind before the House that we may have the whole case as fully and clearly in our hands as possible. This will prevent us from being taken by surprise, and will protect the committee in their work, so that no one will charge them with having brought anything as a surprise upon the House. I take this occasion to make these observations, as the result of much reflection, on what I have seen in many sessions of Congress.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think it worth while to make a suggestion in addition to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and that, not in reference to this particular bill. Parties who have claims against others outside of Congress usually get but one hearing. They bring their claim before some competent tribunal, and prosecute it to final judgment, and that is a bar to all subsequent proceedings in that case. Any one who has been in this House for more than one session understands that the judgment of this House adverse to a claim, and sometimes even the judgment of this House in favor of a claim in part, is no end to that claim; that it comes here Congress after Congress and year after year, and is sent at times to different committees, as we have had an illustration here this morning. After it has failed in one committee in one Congress, it will come before the next Congress and be sent to another committee, with the hope by these various devices of getting some reversal of some former adverse judgment.

Now, sir, it seems to me there has been legislation in the last few years in the right direction in creating the southern claims commission and other commissions outside of Congress to hear these matters, and in making some provision that the disposal of the claims before these commissions shall be final, and that they shall not afterward plague Congress or any other body. I know, of course, that Congress can consider any of these claims, although the commission or court may have rejected them. But these claims come here frequently of so old a date, some of them twenty, thirty, or even fifty years old—one came here during the last session of Congress nearly fifty years old, and had been here, I presume, as many times as it was years old—that, although the old members may be familiar with them, there is a hope on the part of those who press them that the new members may not be acquainted with them, and that somehow or other they may pass. Now gentlemen have seen here to-day how few members of the House really attend to a report which is read from the desk, and how few members know the merits of the claim which has been discussed here. I confess I do not know them, and I should not be prepared to decide in regard to it, except on the judgment of those who have reported this claim as a just one.

It seems to me, therefore, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entitled to the thanks of the House for the persistent way in which he insists on getting the facts before the House on all these claims; and the member who is in fact an obstructive in such legislation as this is after all, while not increasing his own popularity with his fellow-members, doing the country and the Treasury a service. And if the growth of these claims should induce Congress to authorize the constitution of some tribunal in which the United States can be sued and in which all parties can go and ask redress, if they have any legal claim, it would be a great step, in my judgment, toward facilitating the business of Congress; toward the taking out from this body the great mass of private claims which comes here and occupies the attention of committees and of this House, to where they can be decided on their merits, and where, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has said, if a person has a lawful contract, he can have it respected by a court which decides according to the principles of law.

So far as my experience goes here in this House the honest claim, as a rule, is the claim that does not get through. A claim that is not backed by men who are to share in what is looked on to some extent as the plunder or the bounty of the Congress is a claim that stands small chance of passing; but a claim that is often a fraud, almost, on its face, that comes in here with a swarm of supporters on the outside pressing it on the attention of Congress in every possible way, is as likely as not to get through in the end by unanimous consent. Now, if we can do anything to have these claims tried upon their merits it will be a great step in the right direction, and in my judgment this body is not the proper body to try them.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I believe, Mr. Chairman, it is conceded by every one that this bill ought to pass. There has been a good deal of discussion upon it, but I do not understand that any gentleman has had anything to say in opposition to the bill itself.

I am glad to see that the labors and duties of the Committee on Claims are appreciated by the gentlemen who have addressed the committee. I can assure gentlemen that the committee feel that they have a work to perform which requires great labor, care, and diligence; and I think I may say on behalf of the committee that they will not shirk any labor or responsibility imposed on them by reason of the position they occupy. They will endeavor to examine every claim carefully, and to present it to the House in such shape that the House may be enabled to understand its merits.

Now, for the purpose of relieving the Committee on Claims, the Court of Claims was established, and afterward what is known as the southern claims commission, and during the present session a Committee on War Claims has been created for the purpose of relieving the Committee on Claims of a portion of the onerous labors cast upon it in previous Congresses. There is, of course, however, an immense amount of business still referred to the committee. This case was properly sent to that committee, and could not have properly gone anywhere else; and it is conceded by every one who knows anything about it that it is a just and meritorious claim. As I remarked before, the only difficulty the Committee on Claims had in regard to it was that they thought it an outrage that the Government had not paid these gentlemen before. It was shown before the committee of the last Congress that these men were worth $40,000 at the time they entered into a contract with the Government, and because the Government refused to carry out that contract they were bankrupted, and both died bankrupts. Their representatives have sought everywhere for redress, and have failed to get it. In 1860 or 1861, when Mr. Black was Attorney-General, the question was referred to him by the War Department whether the contract had been violated on the part of the Government, and he stated unhesitatingly and unequivocally that the contract had been violated by the Government; that these men had a right to deliver the grain under the contract, according to its terms, and that that right was denied them. Their representatives now ask, not to be reimbursed, not what they might have made in the way of profits, not even what they sustained in the way of damages, but simply a part of what they lost because the Government failed to fulfill its agreement solemnly made with them.

I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

The committee proceeded to the consideration of the next bill upon the Calendar, being a bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand that the House has agreed to take up another matter at three o'clock, and as that hour has arrived, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. WHEELER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SCOFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report to the House the bill (H. R. No. 1038) for the relief of the estates of Abel Gilbert and William Gerrish, late copartners in business under the style of Gilbert & Gerrish, with the recommendation that it do pass.

GILBERT AND GERRISH.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move the previous question on the bill reported from the committee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. KELLEY. Objection having been withdrawn to the holding of a session to-morrow for debate only as in Committee of the Whole, I renew the suggestion. I may say that there are a number of gentlemen prepared to speak, and they may as well be permitted to speak to-morrow as at any other time; there will be no votes taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection to that; several gentlemen on both sides of the House desire to speak.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope gentlemen will withdraw their objections. There can be no harm done by speaking, and no votes can be taken. Gentlemen have their speeches prepared and may as well be permitted to make them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LOWNDES. I object.

DEATH OF HON. JAMES BROOKS.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my duty to announce to the House, according to our invariable custom, the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS. He was the member-elect from the sixth district of New York—the district which has honored me as his successor. He was not a resident of the district; nor is it the custom there to limit selections from the mere fact of locality; (the district is made up of men of various industries and nationalities;) but he was in his previous service, as in the last election, regarded rather as one of the chosen of the whole city—representative of all classes of men and interests.

There are others here—especially my colleague, [Mr. WOOD,] who is better fitted, by longer acquaintance with Mr. BROOKS, to speak of him and his characteristics—who will address you.

Mr. Speaker, there is sometimes a mournful amenity in these offices of respect to the dead. I always approach this kind of duty with a feeling of depression that scarcely allows me the ordinary utterance. Sometimes in my line of duty I have been called on to speak in public of the dead. Once, when first in Congress, when the chivalric soldier of our Mexican war and that southern statesman, General Quitman, died. The task seemed easy then; for I had almost felt his gentle, low tones, when as a very young Congressman I sat at his feet, and his shining and dashing military service gave bright points for memory and speech; but when the time came, although my preparation had been made, my heart failed me. Then, again, when Judge Douglas died, it was, in part, mine to pronounce his eulogy here. He was very near to me; for we had shared our dissent from our party, and expected to make our future alike during the imminent events of the then impending struggle. Besides, the marked features of his mind, knotted to intense strength by that fearful spring and summer of 1861, made an analysis of character and associations of patriotism spring full-armed from the thought. Again, when the war ended, I was summoned to the grave of Vallandigham. I had been with him in his marked and peculiar career, sometimes in resistance to it and sometimes in its aid; but I found in his case that time and reflection had mitigated the fiercer, and elevated the better elements of his nature, and, amid the mourning of the valley in which he lived, no party harshness disturbed the gentle and tearful thoughts which the illustration of his admirable traits recalled. And later, only last winter, when the jarring of the elective contest was over, and the sudden tragedy of Horace Greeley's death was recognized in fitting terms even by his opponents in Congress, it was again my duty, in a brief tribute, to awaken the better angels of our nature; not, I trust, altogether in vain; for, after all our bickerings, these angels appear to touch the chords of finer feeling, and their sad melody, while they chasten the heart, inspire a nobler sense of private and public duty. On all of these four occasions, the dead who were honored were connected, as was Mr. BROOKS, with the struggles incident to our civil conflict; and, with all, there had been relations that outlive the fleeting honors and passions of the hour.

Now another voice is still. It was seldom raised in angry debate, though it had at times its high and indignant key. One so used to it as myself, hearing it by day and night here for many years, making even statistics attractive and ethics graphic, can easily recall its mellifluous periods. As Bulwer wrote of Derby, the Rupert of English debate—

> —who not listened with delighted smile
> To the sweet music of that silver style?

I heard it first in 1856, in the city of Columbus, Ohio. It was then full of warning against the excesses of sectional strife. I heard it often between that time and our last service together. It was as effective on the questions of finance and economy as for the public credit and personal liberty. In both these lines of legislative battle, the minority could only protest.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. BROOKS had many opportunities for mitigating the rigors of our taxing systems. In the long contest of the Forty-first Congress on the tariff, after two months in discussion on each one of the thousand articles of taxation, when every sort of information was required, we compelled the able leader, General Schenck, to drop down forty millions. The credit for that reduction should inure as much to JAMES BROOKS as to the honored minister at Saint James. But it was during the closing years of the war, and even long after its termination, that the dash of this "Rupert of debate" was most brilliantly effective. Questions of personal liberty were involved. These questions were not alone associated with rights of suffrage; they touched the rights of communities and States; and they involved the use of that dangerous engine of government which Blackstone said "would soon put an end of all other rights and immunities." There had come into our public conduct the frequent use of that senatorial decree, when Rome had recourse to a dictator, "Senatus consultum ultimæ necessitatis." During those contests that found Congress in violent session at dawn, the voice and gesture of JAMES BROOKS were heard and seen in constant and defiant remonstrance. These things are matter of honorable record, which, however we may for a time forget in the irreconcilable spirit of actual war, are, nevertheless, an incentive and ensample to all time for the perpetuity of earnest and critical debate in the interests of freedom of thought and opinion. They are hallowed by the powerful prose of John Milton in his Areopagitica, a plea for unlicensed printing, and vindicated in the message of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. BROOKS was a successful journalist, of great experience. It was that experience, aided by extensive travel and intelligent observation, which gave him such a ready and facile power as a parliamentarian and debater. What Lord Coke said of his own profession, might be said with reference to that of Mr. BROOKS: it fitted him for the "occasion sudden." When in his earlier career in Congress in 1847, 1848, 1849, and 1850, he was associated with the giants of those days, his varied information and graceful elocution made his discussions interesting, cogent, and emphatic. He was equally at home in finance, in international law, in domestic and interstate and federal relations. His early discussions abound in proofs of readiness of repartee and richness of imagery and thought. The orators of that day, men like Webster, Douglas, Clay, Gentry, Winthrop, Ashmun—a whole heaven of stars—made it difficult for a young member to rise above the ordinary horizon of influence and discussion. But Mr. BROOKS accomplished it.

But what an extensive field he has occupied since! When he began in the Thirty-first Congress it had hardly more than half the number which Congress now has. Now we have three hundred members. Then it was easy to attract the House; now it is almost impossible, except with such debaters as JAMES BROOKS, to have or hold what the Spaniards call in the Cortes "the word," and which we ignobly call "the floor." Since then we have grown in territory and area. We have grown beyond prophecy great, and with fresh and dangerous complications in our federal policies.

With these growths has grown the arena of legislative and newspaper debate. In form and size, as well as in subjects of intellectual gladiatorship, it has grown; but we are producing the gladiators. In these new phases of our progression, Mr. BROOKS, had he been spared, would have taken a capital part. In questions of commercial adventure and advantage, of liberty to trade over sea and land without shackles for any; and especially in those problems of finance, the legacies of the war, and those which affect the credit of our bonds, and the lightening of our burdens upon industry, he would have shone peerlessly.

But for him there is now no more an earthly prospect. He who so lately told us of his travels to distant Cathay and the gates of India, making his voyage around the globe, and in vain seeking for health in the perpetual change of scene and in the too fatal unrest of journeying, has sailed, at last, upon a shoreless sea. But the interest associated with his name, whether as an orphan boy and a self-made man, as a scholar and teacher, a rare journalist and legislator, an observant and adventurous traveler, and a man of reserved though active life; whether as a friend, husband, and father, these will be remembered long after criticism is hushed, and the events which have fashioned his life and character have been erased by the lapse of time.

There is a class of influences which follows upon decay and death to relieve us from the pain of both. Animosities fail and memory ceases to remind us of their transient causes; the judgment grows calm, lenient, and just, as well toward the dead as the living; worldly advancement has less inducement, and the felicity which it is supposed to give seems, alas! so unreal, fleeting, and brief. Time is said to be the best ally of our moral nature; it acts as well upon mind as body; "it brings mellowness by the operation of decay much as it brings beauty to ruins." As palaces crumble into picturesqueness, so we melt and fade, as we become less passionate and irritable, into the gentle and good. This is a wise provision of the good Author of our being from which no one is exempt. Congresses which listened to Mr. BROOKS so often and so attentively; New York City, whose fame and interests were so enhanced by his pen and vote; this country, which he loved with all the ardor of patriotism, in the light of these gentle amenities of time and death, honor themselves by honoring him. In the great volume of our American peerage his insignia may not be illustrated by stars, orders, or crosses; these he would have won in other lands. He takes precedence here by virtue of a thoughtful, energetic, American manhood.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the death of Hon. JAMES BROOKS, a member of this House from the city of New York.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect to the memory of this distinguished statesman, the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk to the family of the deceased.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, with the departed member, to whose recollection and memory we have set aside this flitting hour, I had peculiar relations. I knew him well. He had been my colleague and associate in Congress for many consecutive years. Our official and personal intercourse was necessarily frequent—indeed constant. Whatever may have been his appearance to others as a man, while acting in common with us all his part on this legislative stage, to me he was known in the field of humanity when the heart beats only to natural impulses and the brain moves the judgment, uninfluenced by passion, prejudice, or interest. Therefore I can speak of JAMES BROOKS as he was, not as he appeared to others; not as malevolence may have conceived or partiality may have wished; not as error may have accused nor friendship defended; but as he was as a man, as God had made him, improved and ornamented by a high order of cultivation, and thus made superior to the original inherent qualities. And as such I propose to speak of him. I admit that to the exterior observer he seemed cold and unsocial, but this estimate of his character was taken from distant observation, made too far off to enable an accurate conclusion.

The man of superior mental strength, feeling secure in the advantage of his own power, is often erroneously charged with want of sympathy with others. A consciousness of greater intelligence will sometimes cause reserve, especially from the crowd which attempts to surround and influence public men. Nor will true merit bend readily to that irresponsible tyrant which assumes at once to create, represent, and direct what is called popular opinion. Establishing his own estimate of political right, founded on principle, he cannot deviate from his position without a loss of self-respect and a departure from duty which would render him unworthy of the character of a Representative. Like the strong ship at sea, pursuing regularly and steadily her onward course to a destined end, so will such a man continue in the maintenance of his position, confident that, notwithstanding the foreboding clouds and threatening elements, he will be finally vindicated and his adherence to right crowned with the approval of all good men who love their country. The commendation of others is unworthy of consideration.

Of this class was JAMES BROOKS. As such he was no ordinary man. It was difficult to understand him. He should not be judged by the standard which the temper of the times has established. Although always heartily supported by the masses, he was apparently not of them nor with them. He never appealed to the people in vain; they always responded to his call, though he never flattered nor deceived them. He was too proud and too conscious of innate strength to resort to the now common practice of assuming to be what he was not, so that he could obtain preferment.

As a man, he possessed remarkable personal characteristics. His mind, as originally constituted, was of the first order. By study, travel, observation, and practical contact with the world for a third of a century, he had added the advantages thus acquired, and at the time of his demise he was in possession of personal qualities equal to those of any other man now living in the enjoyment of active political life.

Few of our public men are scholars; he was one of the most cultivated. Few are orators; he had no superior as such in either House of Congress. Few are sufficiently studious to master the abstruse sciences, and to excel in the mathematical arrangement of statistics so far as to make them illustrations for argument and demonstrations for conclusions; he was distinguished for these rare qualities. Few know when to enter the arena of debate, and to seize the opportune moment to successfully attack the weak points of an opponent's stronghold; but he never failed in the attempt to do so. As a parliamentarian he was skillful and well informed; as a committeeman he was attentive and laborious; and as a member of this House he was seldom absent or unmindful of the obligations and duties imposed.

Mr. Speaker, thus far I have referred to Mr. BROOKS only as a public man. I hesitate to enter that sacred precinct hallowed to the dearest emotions of us all—the domestic sanctuary. All of us have two phases to our characters—the outdoor and the indoor. That for the world, where men act a part; and that of the fireside, where the more natural qualities are developed and so many more congenial pursuits are practiced.

As a husband and father he was devoted, affectionate, indulgent, and kind; and in all his personal intercourse with others he was just, considerate, and liberal, commanding respect—often admiration, and sometimes esteem.

That he went to his grave without enemies and without accusation I do not affirm; but that he was justly accused and merited the reproach so unmercifully heaped upon his devoted head I do deny. The last days of his public life was an eventful period in his career. It seemed as if the vials of wrath which had been hidden for a quarter of a century had all been reserved for that occasion, so as to accomplish at once a social, political, and physical death.

But this is not the occasion to revive that painful scene, so familiar to us all. Whatever may have been the motives which prompted it, whatever may have been its effects in producing results, he is now beyond the reach of either. His name and fame rest secure in the hearts of those who knew him best. But while this may not be the occasion to recall these attendant incidents of the last days of his career, it is the occasion to make them useful as a moral. Let us pause to do so, and to dwell for a moment upon what I deem to be the most dangerous existing obstacle in this country to the success of our experiment of free government. I refer to the want of respect for authority—the lack of reverence, so to speak, for the public acts of those who make and those who enforce the laws—a pervading contempt for the law-making as well as the law expounding and executing power. The wholesome restraints which the security of life and property require are thus loosened. Men who are taught to believe that those who make the laws are themselves lawless will not have much respect for either. Thus classes which, while under proper check, are harmless, become dangerous even to the foundation upon which rests the security of social order. And even with the more intelligent there is a disposition to encourage this want of confidence in the chosen rulers, which as an example operates prejudicially to their own interests in its demoralizing effect upon others who are less qualified to judge. Take for instance this Congress. It has been in existence but for a few weeks; it is the elected representation of the people of the United States, recently chosen. If is made up as a whole of men of pure personal and public character, of much ability, who desire to do their duty, and to command the respect and confidence of those who sent them here; and yet this body has been maligned, charged with sins of omission and commission, and held up to public contempt. In advance, before really having had time to prepare matter for deliberation and conclusion, an attempt is made to depreciate its intelligence, integrity, and usefulness, so as to deprive anything it may do hereafter for the public welfare of its proper merit and respect. We are accused when we act, and accused when we do not act; assailed in our motives, reproached in our capacities, and decried in our characters. Nothing receives encomium which emanates from Congress. Instead of being a post of honor, a seat on this floor would seem to be one of dishonor. However pure and upright, however eminent and able members may have been esteemed at home, the fact that they hold seats here appears to have changed their characters, and they have become ignorant or depraved. Such it would seem the people are being taught to look upon us. An influence is constantly at work to establish for us such a position before the world. Thus, those in authority are lessened in public esteem. We who make the laws are ourselves denounced as lawless, the effect of which is to lessen respect for the law itself, and to bring into disrepute the Government and institutions of the country. May it not be said that a false public sentiment of this character will at some period demand victims to be offered up as sacrifices to its own distempered and feverish error? And may it not be further said, that as "Death loves a shining mark," so does this pernicious monster seek the highest and brightest walks of public life for those whom it would slay upon the altar of its folly? And should it therefore be thought a marvel, with such a prevailing error of public judgment, and such a distempered and diseased demand for the destruction of reputation, that Mr. BROOKS should have been accused, even as he was, upon the mere shadow of a foundation of the slightest pretext of a possible case, and then condemned without trial, amid the howl of an infuriated demand for a victim, before which his judges stood aghast, fearing to do their duty, lest they themselves should also be accused and be sacrificed?

I will not pursue this thought further. He is gone. All that was mortal has departed from this life forever. That bright intellect, that proud heart; that man of thought, of brain, and nerve has gone to his long rest, to the home of his ancestors. He precedes us but by a day. Yesterday became his time. To-day thousands of others are following; and to-morrow we shall crowd into that narrow cell, and take our places in the long line of candidates for immortality. May our places here be filled by those who will throw the mantle of charity over our errors. May our faults find no reproaches from those who will come after us. And when at last the great call shall come for all to render their accounts, then, and not till then, let us be adjudged. We shall then know, and not till then, who has filled the requirements of the law, and fully come up to the standard of public and private virtue reared for the measurement of the public men of the day.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, whatever of eulogy or tribute to character is fit for this occasion has already found eloquent utterance from the lips of colleagues of Mr. BROOKS, as Representatives of the State of New York. I hope it may not be deemed intrusion if one who has served many years with him in this Hall should venture to add a word of testimony to his fidelity to convictions in the public service.

And after all, sir, this is the test and measure of our life here. Whatever may be the present flavor, fruit gathered from any other tree will sooner or later turn to dry ashes in our grasp. Varied attainments, intellectual culture, rare gifts, or great powers, however conspicuous, cannot alone achieve immortality in public station. On the other hand, he who reaches the joy of conviction, though it be through the pains of doubt, clasping it as a mother doth her first-born, and then marks all his pathway with the courage of its assertion, builds for the future, however he may fail of passing recognition.

I was a member of this body when Mr. BROOKS returned to it at the beginning of the Thirty-eighth Congress from that retirement into which the final dissolution of the whig party had forced the public men who had distinguished and survived it. Eight or ten years, not inappropriately termed "the formation period in politics," had elapsed between the extinction of whig expectations and hopes and the reentrance of Mr. BROOKS into this Hall as a democratic Representative. It is consonant neither with propriety nor inclination to dwell for a moment upon those great historic questions around which parties ultimately crystallized into present political organizations. It is sufficient, in illustration of that element in Mr. BROOKS's character of which I speak, to say that he did not at once take up his position in the ranks of the hereditary enemy of that grand old organization whose flag had just been furled away by its gallant but unsuccessful followers. Those were years to him of doubt and examination, of the study of men and measures, as well as the ultimate tendency and drift of events. And if in the end, when alone the unerring judgment of mankind on these times shall be made up, it shall appear that he erred in his final decision between men and parties, yet such were his convictions, and he obeyed them. What other guide could he follow?

It was thus that Mr. BROOKS left this Hall in 1853, a most zealous and effective opponent of the then democratic party, and returned to it in 1863 an equally ardent and enthusiastic supporter of the men and measures of that same party as now organized and dominated. One who has been a witness of his subsequent public life, and has constantly differed with him on all political questions, is ready, now that the curtain has fallen upon it and it cannot be amended, to bear testimony to his fidelity throughout, to convictions that followed careful and enlightened examination.

Few, if any, public men have ever been able to bring to the discharge of public duties minds so well stored and trained for their work as Mr. BROOKS. For more than forty years he had been intimately conversant with the public men of all parties who, here at the Capitol, shaped or were shapen by the events here transpiring; and during all that time was in the most confidential relations with the leading men of his own party affiliations, of whom for many years he was a chief. He was himself the founder, as he was through all the subsequent years of his life the restraining guide, of that power which the daily press of the country has set up here in Washington, making and unmaking public men, invaluable when under just and intelligent control, but pestiferous when blinded by prejudice or ignorance. His were the first "Letters from the Capitol" upon current events and characters, so popular and attractive as to draw after them imitations of every variety of merit and every measure of success. With the largest opportunity for travel at home and in foreign lands, he delighted in its pleasures and profits, constantly storing his mind with its lessons, and cultivating a rare and refined taste for the enjoyments they so richly afford. The conductor of a leading political daily paper for more than a generation, his mind was at all times drilled and equipped for every shifting phase of political warfare—constantly filed for incisive attack, always armed for the most desperate defense, abundantly supplied for the most protracted siege, and ever waiting in readiness for the most subtle surprise. Thus the every-day weapons of the journalist became the armor in which he entered upon the conflicts of this arena, making him a formidable antagonist whenever he engaged in debate. The remarkably comprehensive character of that erudition with which the great variety and diversity of his pursuits from early life had stored his mind gave him a greater share than almost any of his contemporaries of that first element of successful oratory, a thorough knowledge of all possible topics of discussion. He was consequently better prepared for instant debate than most men after elaborate preparation on all questions of current legislation. Attractive in the manner of his speaking, affluent and ornate as well as accurate in his style, and always new and fresh in thought and matter, he never failed for attentive and instructed listeners.

Mr. BROOKS was also faithful to detail in the discharge of his duties here. For the last eight years he served upon the Committee on Ways and Means, the last two of which I was his colleague, and the daily witness of his fidelity to the minutest details of its diversified and exacting duties. There is hardly a constituency—if there be any—represented here so sensitive in all its multiplied and diversified variety of pursuits and interests to the work of that committee as the one represented by him, and his zeal and fidelity in their behalf long outlasted his strength.

His associates in the committee-room first observed, in his relaxing grasp of labor there, the presence of that fatal disease whose insidious approach he himself had not yet detected; and as day by day it fed on his strength, they came more and more to value, as they were losing it, the share he had borne of the burdens there imposed. As the end approached clouds gathered around his good name. And the saddest of all thoughts read upon his countenance when, more than once, strength failing him at the very door of the committee-room, I helped him to a place of rest beyond the sound of denunciations raging in this Hall, was the fear that he might not live to see that vindication which faith and justice told him that the future would surely tender him. The times are not yet ready for that vindication, nor is this the occasion to enter upon it, but you will bear one word from me: The reputation of a life may be assassinated as well as lost.

Mr. BROOKS has left no other in public life whose connection with it dates back like his to the very beginnings of those great conflicts which ultimately drenched the land in blood. No one now remains to still further participate in public affairs who, like him, witnessed the first wrestling of the giants of the Republic with those great constitutional questions which found their solution only on the battle-field.

Who can now mark the march of events through each of the great historic periods, from nullification to secession, from secession to surrender, and from surrender to restoration, and like him say, "All of which I saw, and much of which I was?" The grave is closing over the witnesses; the lessons only survive. And as our ranks close up for the discharge of those duties to which these lessons summon us, let us be admonished, while the shafts are falling thick and fast among us, that death leaves no room for amendment of the record day by day made up.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, after all that has been so well and appropriately said, it may still be not improper for me to utter a brief, spontaneous tribute to one with whom I served in these Halls for nearly ten years. When, at the beginning of the Thirty-eighth Congress, Mr. JAMES BROOKS and I met, it was as members of opposing parties in a time not only of high party but of great national excitement. I saw at once that he was a man of more than ordinary power, and was armed with all the weapons derived from great legislative observation and experience; that he was a man in whom the ablest on this floor would find on any question a dangerous antagonist. I would, therefore, have been glad to know him, but there was a reserve in his manner that made him almost inaccessible to strangers.

I soon discovered that it was almost impossible for JAMES BROOKS and me to arrive at the same conclusion on public questions. From the same premises we ever deduced conflicting conclusions. We seemed to be born antagonists; and to the day he left this Hall, as those who listened to the discussions on industrial and financial questions during the last Congresses will remember, this antagonism was never overcome. Yet, sir, I learned not only to know but to love Mr. BROOKS as a genial and instructive companion.

For the last four years of his life I served with him upon the Committee on Ways and Means. And in 1869, under instructions from this House, we traveled not only along the Atlantic coast, inquiring into the administration of our customs laws and as to the possibility of improving them by congressional action, but across the continent in the first train of passenger cars that bore citizens from the waters of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific, thence by sea along the Pacific coast from the beautiful city of San Francisco to Portland, Oregon, and over the waters of the Willamette, and through the unequaled scenery of the Columbia River. We returned as companions, mingling, at each port of entry, duty with pleasure. Then it was that I learned what JAMES BROOKS was in social life, how gentle was his heart, how cordial though courtly his manner, how studious he was of the comfort and enjoyment of all within his social influence. That was a season of rare instruction to me. Travel is ever instructive to a thoughtful and observing man. But Mr. BROOKS had been a traveler from his youth; and his life when not in motion had been passed in the widest field of observation of men and manners afforded by our country.

While yet little more than a boy he had won the confidence and intimate association of the then great men of our country by the vigor of his pen and his effective power of description of the scenes accompanying discussion and debate, and his analysis of public measures, and the motives of men who were dealing with them. His memory was charged with instructive anecdotes and incidents running back through the history of his country for the better portion of half a century. And O, how apt he was in giving them application.

From my social intercourse with Mr. BROOKS I have derived one of the chief lessons of my legislative life. It is a useful one, and would have been eminently so to me at the commencement of my career. It is this, to accept as conscientious the convictions of my adversary, and yield to him all the respect for their maintenance that I claim for myself when resisting conscientiously the cherished convictions of others, and to hope to find, outside of the angry controversies of debate, that which is genial and lovable in him in whom I have found a courageous and persistent adversary.

In the respects to which I have alluded, we shall rarely find another JAMES BROOKS, who was so positive on the line of duty, yet so gentle and so winning in the social circle. We who knew him well will long mourn his loss. And we alone can duly sympathize with those in whose life his own was centered, and who found in him the very light of their lives, the dear ones who nestled at his hearthside.

The question was then taken on the resolutions offered by Mr. COX; and they were adopted unanimously.

SESSION FOR DEBATE TO-MORROW.

Mr. KELLEY. Before proceeding with any other business, I again suggest that to-morrow be set apart for debate only, as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted. I understand that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LOWNDES] withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and it is ordered accordingly. Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, will occupy the chair to-morrow as Speaker pro tempore.

DEATH OF HON. WILDER D. FOSTER.

Mr. WALDRON. Mr. Speaker, it is a common event, in the experience of this body, which reminds us of the uncertainty of life, but this is the first time that a Representative from Michigan has interrupted the regular course of legislation in this Capitol to announce the death of a colleague.

On the 20th day of September last Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, a Representative from the fifth district of Michigan, sank to his last rest. He met the last summons in the midst of family and friends, receiving every kind attention that devoted affection could suggest. His last visions on earth were of scenes most endeared to him by the memories of the past, and he ended his earthly career in the city of his home, where as neighbor, friend, husband, and father he had been longest known and was best appreciated.

Mr. FOSTER was born in Orange County, New York, on the 8th of January, 1819. In the year 1837 he moved to the State of Michigan, and the year following found him toiling as a mechanic in the village of Grand Rapids. His industry, sound judgment, and integrity were the sure passports to business success, and from a humble beginning he advanced to a prominent position among the manufacturers and merchants of what is now the second city of our State. For thirty years he was identified with the interests of that city, and no man enjoyed in a greater degree the confidence and respect of its citizens. While he sought no official recognition, the clear, sterling sense of his neighbors sought him out, as the man who, tried by years of experience, was the proper depositary of official responsibility. For a quarter of a century he was a member of the board in whose charge the educational interests of his city were placed. He filled repeatedly the offices of city treasurer and mayor. He was a member of the State senate for two years. He was elected in 1871 to the Forty-second Congress, and was re-elected to the Forty-third Congress by the largest majority ever given in the counties composing the district.

Mr. FOSTER was possessed of a vigorous constitution and had enjoyed uniform good health. The cares and confinement of congressional life had, during the last session, impaired it, but when he left this Hall in March last he did it with a hopeful confidence that wasted vigor would be restored by change of scene and relaxation from labor; but the heavy hand of disease had fastened itself upon him; human sympathy and skill were alike unavailing to alleviate its rigor or lighten its weight; and arranging his worldly interests in view of the approaching end, he went down into the dark valley with the confidence that is born of a clear conscience and an honest life.

It was my fortune during the last session of Congress to live under the same roof with my late colleague—to meet him daily at the same board; and I there had abundant opportunity to learn his worth, appreciate his excellence, and prize his friendship. As a legislator he was marked by clearness of apprehension, soundness of judgment, and sterling integrity of purpose. As a man he possessed the generous impulses and the winning frankness which secured for him popularity and esteem. Knowing him as I did, I could well understand why the tidings of his death were to his constituency the announcement of the loss of a long-tried and valuable friend. He had no enemies. "Performing his own duties in private life, and making his own record in public life," as his conscience and judgment dictated, he won alike the respect of political friends and foes.

There is much, Mr. Speaker, in the contests of political parties which savors of uncharitableness, of unfairness, and of bitter detraction toward candidates for place; but it was a bright contrast to this prevailing tendency when the political opponents of Mr. FOSTER assembled in convention to nominate his successor. They prefaced their deliberations by a resolution bearing public testimony to the purity of his character and the worth of his services. It was a departure from the usual routine of convention work, and it showed how a good man's life disarmed the hostility of partisan warfare.

By his death the State loses an honored citizen and a faithful Representative. The city of his residence misses one who was foremost in every good work of development and improvement. The poor will miss a kind counselor and generous friend. But it is within the sanctuary of his own home that the darkest shadow rests. It is where he was best known and most fondly loved that the blow falls with most crushing weight. But even to these mourners this loss is not without its consolations. The legacy of a stainless reputation is to them more precious than the competence which his industry had earned. The consciousness that the responsibilities of his life had been well met, that its duties had been well performed, is a satisfaction even in the hour of sorrow; and the tribute that we pay to his memory in these feeble utterances, and in the expression which this House is about to make, will be a grateful recollection to those who mourn.

Mr. Speaker, the tidings of death which are so often heard in this Chamber warn us to turn aside from the contests of parties and the pursuits of ambition to listen to the voice of one who, speaking to us by the death of our associate, reminds us how vain the hopes, how empty the honors, how fleeting the years, of human life. When our time comes to join the ever-moving procession to the tomb, we shall be indeed fortunate if we leave behind us the same good name, the same cherished memories, which now cluster about the grave of WILDER D. FOSTER.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep regret the announcement of the death of Hon. WILDER D. FOSTER, late a member of this House from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect, that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, there are times when, in the midst of the hurry and turmoil of every-day business life, we are called, as citizens, neighbors, friends, and relatives, to leave our labors and our strifes, our anxieties and our cares, to mourn with those who mourn, weep with those who weep, and extend our sympathies to the afflicted and the bereaved.

While this is not only our duty, but our high privilege as citizens, it is also a time-honored custom in the representative halls of the States and of the nation, when one of the members is called from time to eternity to lay aside for the passing moment the duties that devolve upon its members as statesmen, for the purpose of paying the due tribute of respect to the departed, and extending sympathy and condolence to the afflicted and bereaved.

In rising to second the adoption of the resolutions introduced by my colleague I desire to add my feeble tribute of personal respect and regard for the departed, and extend my sympathy to the afflicted widow and bereaved family.

Standing here as I do, in the place of the lamented WILDER D. FOSTER, endeavoring to represent a constituency that he so honestly and faithfully represented, I can but feel the responsibility that rests upon me, and I shall have reached the height of my ambition if I shall have succeeded, when called to leave these Halls, in securing as high and honorable a place in the hearts of my constituents as that acquired by the honest and faithful service of the deceased—a position that led them to say, as with one accord and with one mind, regardless of past political differences and party feelings, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

My personal acquaintance with him was brief. Although residing in a county adjacent to that in which he resided, it was not my good fortune to meet with and make his acquaintance until his first election to Congress; but such acquaintance, though so brief, was sufficient to thoroughly impress upon me the conviction of his purity of motive and integrity of character.

As a business man, his success, though not brilliant, was of that firm, steady, onward growth that showed him to be in an eminent degree the sound, honest, practical man of business.

As a citizen, holding a prominent position in the business interests of the city of Grand Rapids, he was looked up to as a sound financier and a prudent and cautious adviser. The educational interests of that city have received a care and attention unsurpassed by that of any other city in our State. Mr. FOSTER was a watchful guardian of that interest. In the every-day vocations of life he was respected and esteemed for his purity and integrity of character and kind-hearted benevolence and generosity.

As a statesman, he manifested the same regard for the interests of his constituents that he had shown in the interests of his city and his private business. Although not a politician in the ordinary acceptation of the term, he was firm in his convictions of political duty and earnest in carrying them forward.

Modest and retiring in his manner, he was not one to seek for political preferment and official station; but the office the rather sought him and imposed its duties upon him. Influenced by no motive other than the good of his constituents and his country, he was truly the Representative of his district, and esteemed and honored as such.

In his death the district mourns, the State loses one of its most faithful citizens, and the nation is deprived of the valuable services in this Congress of the tried and trusted Representative; but there are others to whom the loss is greater than that of the nation, State, district, or city, and more keenly felt—the afflicted widow mourns, the fatherless mourn. Their loss is not like our loss. We will pass on again after stopping for a brief moment to shed the sympathetic tear, and soon "the place that once knew" the departed "will know him no more forever" among us. Not so with the widow and the fatherless: the sweet memories of the departed will always linger around the hearthstone and the bitter loss. To them we extend our sympathy.

And now, having extended our sympathy to the bereaved and afflicted, and cast a brief glance at the life of the deceased, we will again turn to our daily labors and duties, and soon forget the hour and the occasion. We have these reminders repeatedly brought before us, to convince us that we too "are passing away;" but how readily we forget them—how little do they impress upon us the lesson of our mortality and the necessity of our being "also ready." May this occasion not be so easily forgotten; and may we be able to so fill up the time allotted to us here that when we are called to go down into the dark valley we may receive from the hearts of our neighbors, friends, and constituents the same unanimous verdict received by the lamented FOSTER, "Well done, good and faithful servant." With such a verdict here, may we not have the strongest reason to hope, when we shall have crossed the cold river of death, we will also receive the welcome judgment, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord?"

The resolutions submitted by Mr. WALDRON were unanimously adopted; and in accordance therewith (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 10, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was partly read, when

Mr. MAYNARD said: It is manifest, Mr. Speaker, that the reading of the Journal to-day is a merely perfunctory matter. It is, I believe, desired by the gentlemen present that the day shall be occupied in the delivery of speeches. In order to allow as much time as possible for that purpose, I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FIELD obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. ARTHUR.

THE LOUISIANA QUESTION.

[See Executive Document No. 91, Forty-second Congress, third session, House of Representatives, and Senate Report No. 457, Forty-second Congress, third session.]

Mr. ARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, as preliminary to the views to be submitted, I invite the consideration of the House to the following authorities:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence. (Constitution of the United States, art. 4, sec. 4.)

If the President in executing this power shall fall into error, or invade the rights of the people of the State, it would be in the power of Congress to apply the proper remedy. (Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 45.)

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union. (Constitution of the United States, art. 4, sec. 3.)

The inhabitants of the ceded territory (Louisiana) shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess. (Treaty by and between the United States and the French Republic, April 30, 1803.)

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. (Constitution United States, art. 6, par. 2.)

I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States. (Constitution United States, art. 2, par. 9.)

Unquestionably a military government, established as the permanent government of the State, would not be a republican government, and it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it. (Luther vs. Borden.)

General Grant was elected to the Presidency in 1868. Previously in the same year H. C. Warmoth had been elected governor of the State of Louisiana. Both those high officials were republicans of the same political communion, and both elected by republican votes. In due time they were respectively legally and formally inaugurated. They went forward in the development of their respective administrations. From the period when they were respectively invested with official authority down to the day of the re-election of the general to the Presidency, and subsequently, the official relations of the Federal administration at Washington and the State administration at New Orleans were constitutional and normal. Apparently there was no repulsion, no encroachment, no non-recognition of functionaries. In unquestioned operation, from year to year revolved in appointed orbit all the designated machinery of the three great co-ordinate departments of the local government of reconstructed Louisiana. The Federal Government, together with all its officials, was daily in all legal, practical intercourse with the State government, and the latter with all its officials, of whatever rank or functions, was all the time recognized and accredited as republican in form and practice, and so in terms conceded the habitual fruition of every right, immunity, dignity, and authority requisite in a State of the Federal Union.

In legal contemplation and in fact the existence of the State of Louisiana, with its then pending administration, as an established government, was not only in conformity with the terms of the Federal Constitution, but it was so recognized and observed by the Federal administration, and it so constantly contributed its constitutional part in organizing and equipping the co-ordinate departments of the Federal Government itself.

This completeness of State autonomy, Federal recognition, and executive comity, was equally as absolute and pronounced as to the personnel of the State government. And to the official authority of Governor Warmoth and every other officer of the State the Federal administration was actually, practically, and formally committed, in every aspect of law and fact known or pertaining to our Federal and State systems.

Again and again Louisiana had elected and accredited her Senators and Representatives in Congress. Again and again her Senators and Representatives had appeared at the bar of the Senate and of the House, clothed with their commissions or certificates, signed by Governor Warmoth, and sealed by the great seal of her sovereignty, affixed and attested by his secretary of state. Again and again, the legislative and executive departments of the United States recognized, affirmed, and enforced those commissions. And in all respects those accredited Representatives of the government and people of Louisiana bore their constitutional part, from 1868 to 1872, and subsequently, in the undisputed practical exercise of the supreme law-making power of the central Government.

These facts compose a part of the trite history of the recent past. They are familiar to all. But their suggestion serves a preliminary purpose here. We see in them a perfect instance of the harmonious co-operation of the general and local governments. We see in them a demonstration of the entente cordiale of the Executive of the United States and the executive of the State. In them it is made apparent that Louisiana and her officers bore the same relation, in law and in fact, to the officials of the Union, borne by her sister States and their officials. The difference was none, whether in theory or practice. The parallel was complete, and it continued.

So the two governments stood face to face; so they were intertwined; so they acted and were acted upon.

Congress had decided that the Warmoth government was the established government of Louisiana; the President had decided that the Warmoth government was the established government of Louisiana; the combined official judgments of the legislative and executive departments of the Federal Government had decided that the government of Governor Warmoth was the established government of Louisiana, and so authoritatively settled the grave political question of her constitutional and practical federal status, that the judiciary, the only remaining co-ordinate department, would be bound to, and did, take notice of it as the paramount law. (Luther vs. Borden.)

In the mean time the internal condition of the republican party itself in Louisiana became unsettled. Personal rivalry engendered personal feud. Intestine strife sprang up, and the party was rent asunder. Flushed with dominion, having left no common political enemy to fight, the truculent factions turned upon and fought each other. They had shared each other's confidence, and past community of deeds justified present reciprocity of hate.

> Into the womb
> That bred them they return and howl, and gnaw
> My bowels, their repast; then bursting forth
> Afresh, with conscious terrors vex me round,
> That rest or intermission none I find.

The turbulent annals of dominant faction, torn by feuds blazing up out of a scramble over the common conquests and spoils, furnish no more striking examples of bitter denunciation, imputed infamy, and impatient vengeance.

In the ides of August, 1871, at Baton Rouge, in serried ranks, the furious malcontents were confronted, and open proclamation of revolt and reprisal boldly made. One wing of the party, called the Gatlin-gun convention, nominated William Pitt Kellogg for governor. The other wing, called the Turner-hall convention, departed in savage grandeur home, and in New Orleans nominated P. B. S. Pinchback for governor; and then the word was given to—

> Apply petards, and force the ars'nal gates.

It is not a little curious that this high debate and division in the vitals of the republican party formed the lineal progeny of jealousies and criminations among United States republican office-holders on the one side and Louisiana republican office-holders on the other. And the apple of discord, heretofore found only elsewhere, so grew in the once happy republican family, and disrupted it, by bringing on a sinister party conflict in internal party management, between its State administration and its Federal administration, within the limits of the State of Louisiana.

At the head of one of these hosts militant, now called the custom-house republicans, waved the audacious oriflamme of United States Marshal S. B. Packard; and over the other, now yclept the Turner-hall republicans, floated the nascent banner of P. B. S. Pinchback, called lieutenant-governor of the State.

But ere yet smote the final shock of impending battle and the ensanguined field ran red with sang of patriots, by patriots shed, under the pale glimpses of the inconstant moon, a new shuffle and deal were had, a new cast of characters arranged, and new parts and places in the moving drama assigned. Presto! Pinchback descended from the command of the Turner-hall republicans, and with his following dropped into the ranks of the custom-house republicans, and, presto! again emerged into view among his whilom antagonists their chosen candidate for Congress from the State at large on the Kellogg ticket. So they stood—

> And such a frown
> Each cast at the other, as when two black clouds,
> With heaven's artillery fraught, come rattling on
> Over the Caspian, then stand front to front,
> Hovering a space, till winds the signal blow
> To join their dark encounter.

It is needless to enumerate or enlarge. Those party phenomena cannot be misinterpreted. They are in no sense enigmatical. They may be understood of all men. They disclose a shameless struggle among spoilsmen for the spoils. Candor must so denominate it. The House and country must judge it.

In the course of events rolled round the State and Federal election day. They were identical in time and place in Louisiana. The day was Monday, the 4th day of November, 1872. In addition to electors for President and Vice-President of the United States and members of Congress, on that day were to be elected, for the ensuing four years, governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, and other State officers, including senators and representatives of the General Assembly, to hold for their respective constitutional terms. Accordingly there were presented for the choice of voters two classes of candidates, comprising two rival tickets. The regular republican ticket was headed by Ulysses S. Grant and Henry Wilson for President and Vice-President; William Pitt Kellogg and Cæsar C. Antoine for governor and lieutenant-governor; R. G. Deslonde for secretary of state; A. P. Field for attorney-general; Charles Clinton for auditor; and P. B. S. Pinchback for Congress from the State at large.

The fusion or liberal-republican ticket was headed by Horace Greeley and B. Gratz Brown for President and Vice-President; John McEnery and D. B. Penn for governor and lieutenant-governor; S. Armstead for secretary of state; H. N. Ogden for attorney-general; James Graham for auditor; and G. A. Sheridan for Congress from the State at large.

The present constitution of Louisiana was adopted March 7, 1868. By it is provided—

ART. 25. At its first session under this constitution the General Assembly shall provide by law that the names and residences of all qualified electors shall be registered in order to entitle them to vote; but the registry shall be free of cost to the elector.

ART. 26. No person shall be entitled to vote at any election held in this State except in the parish of his residence, and at the election precinct in which he is registered: Provided, That no voter, in removing from one parish to another, shall lose the right to vote in the former until he has acquired it in the latter.

In pursuance of these provisions of the constitution, on the 16th day of March, 1870, was passed and approved the present registration law of Louisiana, entitled "An act to provide for the revision and correction of the lists of registered voters of the State, the appointment of the various officers necessary therefor, and to prescribe the duties, powers, and compensation of the same," &c.

It was passed by a republican Legislature and approved by a republican governor, and went into, and continued to be in, unquestioned operation. It is eminently a prerogative act. It was obviously intended to, and it plainly did, invest the governor of Louisiana with arbitrary power over popular elections; and the governor, as the representative of his party, had continually executed that power, unchallenged by any republican.

By its provisions the governor of the State, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, was empowered to appoint a State registrar of voters, to hold his office for two years, with a salary of $3,000 per annum, and a clerk, with a salary of $1,500 per annum. By it the governor was empowered to appoint, for the same term, one supervisor of registration for each and every parish in the State, with a salary of seven dollars per day, together with assistants at seven dollars per day and clerks at five dollars per day; and by it the governor was empowered to remove any supervisor or assistant supervisor of registration for failure, refusal, neglect, or inability to perform the duties enjoined upon him by law.

The registration records of the State were transferred from the department of state to the custody of the State registrar of votes, subject to revision and correction by him. The registration of voters, and consequently the liberty of voting, were under the sole arbitrary control of the parish supervisor. He was empowered, at his discretion, to perambulate his parish to facilitate registration. And he was required at stated times, for designated periods prior to election day, to attend at his office for the completion and correction of registration, and it was made his duty to keep open his office until the ninth day before the general election day. He was empowered arbitrarily to strike from the registration-book names of persons for death or removal from the parish since the last registration, and to insert the names of other persons for removal within the parish since the last registration. On examination of the registration-books he is empowered to strike therefrom, by "drawing a line in red ink through the same," the names of all persons whom he may arbitrarily determine to be improperly there. And, restrained only by his arbitrary discretion, he may strike therefrom the names of any number of persons for non-residence in the parish or precinct on the tenth day before the election. And the names remaining on the book of registration, as so corrected by the supervisor of registration, "shall constitute the registry of citizens qualified to vote in the said parish at the next election."

And it is provided in—

SEC. 24. That the said book of registration shall be the only evidence that the persons whose names are found therein have resided for ten days immediately preceding the said election in said parish.

Nine days next before the day of election from the period fixed for the closing of the books of registration, each supervisor is required to make out and furnish certified copies of the lists of all registered voters to the commissioners of election of each parish or polling-place, to be used at the election to be held therein; and the supervisor is required to give to each voter a certificate of his registration; and in case it shall be made to appear by the voter's affidavit that the original has been lost or destroyed, to furnish him a duplicate certificate.

On the application of a voter for registration the supervisor may exact from him, in addition to his own sworn statement, proof by the affidavits of two qualified voters of the precinct whose names are on the registration-books.

And the act further provides, in section 33, "that the decision of any supervisor of registration on all questions of erasure from, or addition to, the registry, and on all questions relating to the registration of voters, shall be final, and shall not be subject to any revision or correction by any parish or district judge. No parish or district judge shall interfere by writ of injunction or mandamus, or other order of court, to compel any supervisor or assistant supervisor of registration to register, or prohibit him from registering, any person," under penalty of, upon conviction, fine, imprisonment, impeachment, and removal from office.

The act consists of forty-four sections. It is diffuse, and contains many formalities and details irrelevant to the main purpose of my remarks, and therefore, and for the necessary economy of time, omitted.

It would require more than Arcadian simplicity not to discern in that registration law all the machinery and latitude necessary to enable an unscrupulous partisan executive, with his venal minions, to dictate the benefits of registration.

By the constitution of Louisiana it is further provided:

ART. 98. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years and upward, born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and a resident of this State one year next preceding an election, and the last ten days within the parish in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed an elector, except those disfranchised by this constitution, and persons under interdiction.

* * * * * * * * * *

ART. 103. The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influence therein from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practice.

* * * * * * * * * *

ART. 107. In elections by the people the vote shall be taken by ballot. * * * *

In virtue of the foregoing provisions of the constitution of Louisiana was passed and approved, March 16, 1870, the election law of that date, entitled—

An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections; to prescribe the mode of making, and designate the officers who shall make, the returns thereof; to prevent fraud, violence, intimidation, riot, tumult, bribery, or corruption at elections, or at any registration or revision of registration; to limit the powers and duties of the sheriffs of the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson; to prescribe the powers and duties of the board and officers of the metropolitan police in reference to elections; to prescribe the mode of entering on the rolls of the senate and house of representatives the names of members; to empower the governor to preserve peace and order; to enforce the laws; to limit the powers and duties of the mayors of the cities of New Orleans and Jefferson with regard to elections; to prohibit district or parish judges from issuing certain writs to commissioners of elections; to make an appropriation for the expenses of the next revision of the registration and of the next election, and to enforce article 103 of the constitution.

Under and in pursuance of that law was held the election of November, 1872, now under consideration. It was passed and approved simultaneously with the registration law previously referred to, and evidently formed part of the same carefully-digested system of state policy. It was conceived and brought forth by the same republican General Assembly, was approved and enforced by the same republican executive, and continued to be recognized by that paramount organization as the only subsisting, valid law upon its subject-matter. This, too, is a grossly prerogative act. It was palpably intended to make the will of the party paramount by means of the executive, whether or not coincident with the will of a majority of the legal voters. And the sweeping prerogative thus conferred had been exercised by the then head of the Louisiana government with the undisguised approbation of the autocratic party which set him up, and by such legislation held up his hands in its own interest; exercised by him, too, without question, and without responsibility or accountability as to the fact or the manner of its exercise.

I will undertake, at the hazard of being tedious, by a few quotations and otherwise, by synopsis, to state, with substantial fairness, the parts of the act relied on by me in the views I am to present.

Except the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson, each parish in the State was designated an election precinct; and the supervisor of registration was empowered in his discretion to direct what number of polls or voting places should be established in each precinct, and to fix the places of holding the election. In the city of New Orleans each ward was made a voting precinct; and in the remaining part of the parish of Orleans, and in the parish of Jefferson, the supervisor of registration was empowered in his discretion to fix both the precincts and voting places in each precinct; and each supervisor of registration was empowered to appoint the commissioners of election throughout his parish.

The election at each poll or voting place was to be presided over by three commissioners of election, with power to fill vacancies, whose sole qualification was to be able to read and write.

It was made the duty of the commissioners of election to receive the ballots of all legal voters and deposit them in the ballot-box in view of the voter of the ballot. For disorderly conduct at the polls they had discretionary power to issue warrants of arrest, and summarily to commit to prison. They were required to keep, signed and sworn to, a list of all the names, numbered, of all persons voting at each poll, and to deliver it, with the box containing the ballots, to the supervisors of registration. They were empowered to administer oaths, and to examine persons touching their right to vote. Each commissioner of election was to receive five dollars per day of duty, upon his written statement, subject to the approval of the supervisor and the governor. They were enjoined to allow only persons to vote who had been duly registered, according to law, as qualified voters. Each voter was allowed to vote only in the parish of his residence, except as to the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson, where they were allowed to vote only in the election precinct of their registration. Every person applying to vote was required to produce his certificate of registration to the commissioners of election. The supervisor of registration was required to furnish to the commissioners of election a list of all registered voters and the number of the certificate of registration of each voter; and it was made the duty of the commissioner to erase from the list the name of the voter on depositing his ballot in the box. It provided in—

SEC. 29. That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, in which during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, or acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting place, or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, shall prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration, or any assistant supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make, in duplicate and under oath, a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

On the close of the election both copies of the statement are to be forwarded to the supervisor of registration; and the supervisor is immediately to forward one copy to the governor, and deposit the other with the clerk of the district court of the parish.

Under penalty of grievous fine and imprisonment, all parish and district judges are prohibited from interfering by injunction, mandamus, or other order of court, with the commissioners of election in any matter relating to the election. And it is made the duty of the governor to cause to be prosecuted such recusant judges. At the polls no voter may be challenged on any question of residence if his name is registered.

Supervisors of registration in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson, six days previous to any general election, shall furnish to the metropolitan police commissioners a copy of the list of registered voters in each precinct in said parishes, upon whose report to the supervisor of registration, as to the names said to be improperly on the list, the supervisor is empowered to strike out and erase therefrom all such names found there.

Under penalty of fine, imprisonment, and removal from office, all sheriffs and their deputies of the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard are prohibited from interfering in any manner with elections, from being stationed at any poll or voting place, and from maintaining or preserving the peace on the day of election. The whole care of the peace and order of the cities of New Orleans, Jefferson, and Carrollton, and of the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and Saint Bernard, on the day of election, is placed in the charge of the metropolitan police, subject to the orders of the governor. And the act provides:

SEC. 53. That immediately upon the close of the polls, on the day of the election, the commissioners of election at each poll or voting place shall seal the ballot-box by pasting slips of paper over the key-hole and the opening in the top thereof, and fastening the same with sealing-wax, on which they shall impress a seal, and they shall write the names of the commissioners on the said slips of paper; they shall forthwith convey the ballot-box, so sealed, to the office of, and deliver said ballot-box to, the supervisor of registration for the parish, who shall keep his office open for that purpose from the hour of the close of the election until all the votes from the several polls or voting places of the precinct shall have been received and counted. The supervisor of registration shall immediately upon the receipt of said ballot-box note its condition and the state of the seals and fastenings thereof, and shall then, in the presence of the commissioners of election and three citizens, freeholders of the parish for such poll or voting place, open the ballot-box, and count the ballots therein, and make a list of all the names of the persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, the number of ballots in the box, and the number of ballots rejected, and the reason therefor. Said statements shall be made in triplicate, and each copy thereof shall be signed and sworn to by the commissioners of election of the poll and by the supervisor of registration. As soon as the supervisor of registration shall have made the statement above provided for, for each poll in his precinct or parish, and it shall have been sworn to and subscribed as above directed, the supervisor of registration shall inclose in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, one copy of such statement from each poll, and one copy of the list of persons voting at each poll, and one copy of any statements as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 29 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-sheets used in making the count and statement of the votes, and shall send such package by mail, properly and plainly addressed, to the governor of the State. The supervisor of registration shall send a second copy of said statement to the governor of the State by the next most safe and speedy mode of conveyance, and shall retain the third copy in his own possession.

SEC. 54. That the governor, lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and John Lynch and T. E. Anderson, or a majority of them, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall, after each election, before entering upon their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election; so help me God."

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the supervisors of registration, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been completed. The governor shall at such meeting open, in the presence of said returning officers, the statements of the supervisors of registration, and the said returning officers shall, from such statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate. One copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and offices voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the elections thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers until set aside, after a contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall within thirty days thereafter issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned.

SEC. 55. That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile, first, the statement from all polls or voting places at which there shall have been a fair, full, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever from any poll or voting place there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration, assistant supervisor of registration, or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 29 of this act, an affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable and full vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting place until the statements from all other polls and voting places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting place; and if from the evidence of such statements they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting place, but shall exclude it from their returns. The returning officers may appoint clerks, &c.

SEC. 56. That it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to transmit to the clerk of the house of representatives and the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly a list of the names of such persons as, according to the returns, shall have been elected to either branch of the General Assembly; and it shall be the duty of said clerk and secretary to place the names of the representatives and senators elect, so furnished, upon the roll of the house and of the senate, respectively; and those representatives and senators whose names are so placed by the clerk and secretary respectively in accordence with the foregoing provisions, and none other, shall be competent to organize the house of representatives or senate. Nothing in this act shall be construed to conflict with article 34 of the constitution, to wit:

"ART. 34. Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, election, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as may be prescribed by law."

SEC. 57. That should any of the returning officers named in this act be a candidate for any office at any election, he shall be disqualified to act as returning officer for that election, and a majority of the remaining returning officers shall summon some respectable citizen to act as returning officer in place of the one so disqualified.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

SEC. 83. That the governor shall take all necessary steps to secure a fair, free, and peaceable election; and shall on the days of election have paramount charge and control of the peace and order of the State; over all peace and public officers, and shall have the command and direction in chief of all police officers, by whomsoever appointed, and of all sheriffs and constables in their capacity as officers of the peace.

The advent of the election day of November, 1872, found in force in Louisiana those two remarkable statutes. Under them all the elections occurring since their approval had been held and determined. Those elections were all successes for the united republican party, and such salutary results more than justified the sanguine expectations founded in the magical pliancy of the machinery of the statutes. The admirers of those statutes had not anticipated division and strife in their own party, when the edge of those very statutes might be turned by republicans against republicans, and hence, in whilom security, they looked forward for the recurrence of the usual auspicious results in the then ensuing election. That election came, and was consummated, no doubt, in pursuance of both the letter and spirit of those statutes. But the result of it, it was soon plain to be seen, was not in harmony with the cherished hopes of the Gatling-gun or custom-house republicans, and thenceforth ensued the most unprecedented and shameless imbroglio in all the multiplied annals of State elections. It arose "not from the casting of the vote, but from the counting of the vote." Baffled but implacable faction immediately sought to recover its losses under cover of a perfidious net-work of specious pretexts and bewildering wiles. Plottings and counter-plottings, never so versatile and grotesque, with demoniac levity pursued the labyrinth around the dishonored, helpless form of Louisiana. Let us thread the giddy maze of ensuing events, with but little amplification or comment, so far forth only as may be necessary and convenient in arriving at rational conclusions upon the merits as affected by Federal interference.

The first registration was made in Louisiana in 1867, under General Phil. Sheridan, of the United States Army, pursuant to the reconstruction acts of that year. By it it appears that there were then in Louisiana, not disfranchised, of persons entitled to vote, white, 44,723; colored, 82,865; total, 127,588. In the same year the vote for and against the convention to frame a State constitution showed a total of 79,174.

At the gubernatorial election in April, 1868, Warmoth, republican, received 64,901, and Taliaferro, democrat, 38,046 votes; total, 102,947.

The registration of 1868 showed a total of voters of 146,398.

At the presidential election in November, 1868, Grant, republican, received 33,322, and Seymour, democrat, 74,668 votes; total, 107,990.

The registration of 1870 showed a total of voters of 153,360.

At the State election for auditor, November, 1870, Graham, republican, received 65,532, and Jume l, democrat, 41,010 votes; total, 106,542.

By the United States census of 1870, the population of Louisiana is set down at, white, 362,065; colored, 364,210; total, 726,915.

The voting strength of that population is estimated, on a ratio of one to five, at, white, 72,311; colored, 72,802; total, 145,113.

The registration of 1872 is not before me.

At the gubernatorial election in November, 1872, by the official returns, McEnery, fusion, received 66,403, and Kellogg, republican, 59,760 votes; total, 126,163.

By adverting to these figures, we may plainly contrast the votes registered and the votes cast in Louisiana heretofore, and by analogy approximately test the integrity of the vote of November, 1872:

	Voters.
Registration in 1867	127,588
Registration in 1868	146,398
Registration in 1870	153,360
	Total vote.
Gubernatorial election in 1868	102,947
Presidential election in 1868	107,990
State auditor's election in 1870	106,542
Gubernatorial election in 1872	126,163

And it appears that in 1867 the registered vote exceeded the actual vote 24,741; in 1868, 38,408; in 1870, (for auditor,) 46,818; in 1872, (for governor,) 27,197.

The election law above cited provides that the governor shall take all necessary steps to secure a fair, free, and peaceable election; and shall, on the days of election, have paramount charge and control of the peace and order of the State. What, then, was the manner of this election, as to fairness, freedom, and peace?

To the main purpose of these remarks an answer to that question would be merely incidental and immaterial, but, nevertheless, I propose to briefly cite some general testimony responsive to it.

Mr. S. B. Packard says of himself that he resides in New Orleans; is a United States marshal for the district of Louisiana; chairman of the republican State committee; is thoroughly acquainted with political affairs in Louisiana, and took an active part in the election of 1872.

Question. What was the conviction as to whether the election was fairly conducted or not after it was over?

Answer. In a majority of the parishes I should say it was fair, or as nearly so as you might expect. We understood, of course, that it is legitimate for those in power to give advantages to their friends, such as are legitimate. Other than that, I should say that in the majority of parishes there was no complaint; but there are some parishes where there is no question but that there were well-grounded complaints of fraud.

Q. I will ask you what you know about the election in New Orleans?

A. Well, I think the count of the vote was tolerably fair in New Orleans. The registration I do not think was fair and truthful. In some instances there were a large number of persons registered as residing in a certain house, which under no circumstances could have contained so many.

Q. You spoke of this election as being in a majority of the parishes a fair election.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Compared with the elections of 1870 and 1868, and on back, how does it compare in fairness with the elections prior to this?

A. I think it was not so fair as the election of 1870, although I did not regard that as a perfectly fair election. I think that in those parishes located in the fourth congressional district especially, which is the strongest republican section in the State, there were greater frauds or more unusual methods used to change them.

Q. Was the complaint made in 1870 by the democratic party in the State that there were frauds committed in them by the republicans?

A. Yes, sir; in some instances they were well founded, and that was the pretended justification in this election, with that party, for the course that they pursued toward the republicans in many instances.

Q. Was the election of 1870 an unfair election?

A. I think there is no such thing as a reasonably fair election; I think an election should be fair; if it is not fair of course it is unfair.

Q. Were you not pretty well satisfied with the election of 1870?

A. The republican ticket prevailed.

Q. There were frauds committed in 1870?

A. Yes, sir; I think there were.

Q. By the republicans or democrats, those of which you complain?

A. In some instances by one, and in some the other.

Q. I ask whether the republican votes cast in 1870 were in favor, in most instances, of the republican or democratic party?

A. I should say in favor of the republican in most instances.

Q. How many fraudulent votes do you think were polled in 1870 for the republican ticket?

A. Not many for the regular republican ticket. In the city of New Orleans I think there were some fraudulent votes polled for the regular republican ticket proper, but that was done for the purpose of getting through members of the house of representatives and senators.

Q. Was not that the case with all the municipal ticket in New Orleans and the parochial ticket?

A. The vote was increased for the city ticket, but the object seemed to be to get through those gentlemen that I have mentioned.

Q. What I want to know is, whether there was a large number of fraudulent votes polled for the republican ticket in 1870?

A. I have no means of getting at the number. My impression is that some fraudulent votes were polled.

Q. As many as 1,000?

A. I should say there was.

Q. Two thousand?

A. I cannot say. My impression is there were as many as that.

Q. Three thousand?

A. I do not know; though my impression is there were 5,000 or 6,000 fraudulent republican votes in 1870 in New Orleans. * * * * *

Mr. GEORGE A. SHERIDAN sworn: Was appointed register of the parish of Carroll in 1867 by General Phil. Sheridan, United States Army. Was afterward sheriff; was subsequently adjutant-general of the State, and for three years last past tax-collector for New Orleans, and was Pinchback's opponent for Congress; traversed the entire State, and twice canvassed it during the campaign of 1872.

Question. Did you find in this campaign a great many colored people who favored the fusion ticket?

Answer. Well, I should think there were 50,000 or 60,000 that attended our meetings, that seemed to take an interest in the proceedings.

Q. That included women and children?

A. Yes, sir; and the men.

Q. About how many colored people would you estimate, from what you saw during the campaign, supported the Greeley fusion ticket in Louisiana?

A. I should think anywhere from 8,000 to 15,000.

Q. Your acquaintance in the State is extensive?

A. As much so as almost any man's, I think.

Q. You think 8,000 to 15,000 colored men supported the fusion ticket in Louisiana?

A. I do.

Q. How many white republicans in Louisiana supported the other ticket?

A. I do not think there are 250 outside of the employés of the Federal Government.

Q. Where are they found? Are they in the city of New Orleans, or all over the State?

A. They are mostly in New Orleans; there are some few in the country; I do not know of 100 men outside of New Orleans.

Q. What is your opinion in reference to the fairness of the election?

A. I think it was the fairest election that has been held in Louisiana for forty years.

Q. You have not been there forty years?

A. No, sir; but I have talked with people who have been there a great deal longer. It is the fairest election we have had since reconstruction, in my judgment.

Q. Was it as fair as in 1870?

A. I do not think there was one-third as much ballot-box stuffing as there was then.

Q. Was there a good deal in 1870?

A. I think there was a large amount of it.

Q. Who had charge of the election in 1870?

A. It was under the auspices of Governor Warmoth.

Q. You think it was a fairer election than in 1870?

A. I think this election was fairer than in 1870; I think it was a better expression of the popular will and feeling, black and white, in the State, than in 1870.

Q. Was there a good deal of complaint about the State in regard to difficulties in the way of registration, and finding the places of registration and voting?

A. There were some complaints.

Q. Were they general?

A. I do not think so; not until after the election had taken place and the Kellogg party found themselves defeated, and then there was a large complaint from all sections of the State.

Q. You say this was the fairest election ever held in that State for forty years?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. If this is the fairest election in Louisiana for forty years, what has been the character of the elections heretofore since you have been there?

A. They have been pretty rough; we have been constantly urged from Washington to carry the State republican, and may have been misled into some little exertions that would never have taken place otherwise.

Q. Who urged you?

A. Our Senators, Mr. Kellogg, Mr. WEST, and prominent gentlemen.

Q. They did not urge you to commit frauds?

A. O, no, sir.

Q. Merely urged you to exert yourselves to carry the State?

A. That is what we did.

Q. But you carried it in a fraudulent manner?

A. I do not know that we did.

Q. You say this was the fairest election you have had.

A. I am personally familiar with this election. I am speaking from hearsay about the others.

Q. You spoke of ballot-box stuffing.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has that been a common thing?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. All over the State?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do the people down there regard that as anything like fair in conducting an election?

A. I think they have got demoralized since the war to a certain extent.

Q. They seem to have been educated to frauds in all elections?

A. I do not know whether they have been educated to it or come by it naturally; I do not think it is confined to any one class of people.

Q. You say "educated;" it is not taught in the schools, I suppose, but has been a part of the political education of men to vote fraudulently?

A. I think in Louisiana there has been, as in every other State, more or less manipulations of elections. We cast this year 20,000 more votes than ever before, and had a fuller registration than ever before.

Governor P. B. S. PINCHBACK. * * * I do not think there were 500 colored men in the whole State that voted for the fusion ticket. I do not think there were 100 who voted against the national republican ticket; in fact, I do not think there was one colored man voted against Grant in the State; but there may have been, perhaps, 50 or 100. I would be willing to stake my reputation that there was not 100 colored men in Louisiana who did not vote for Grant and Wilson. Eight or ten thousand white republicans voted for Grant and Kellogg.

Question. Was there not a great deal of dissatisfaction among the republicans throughout the State at the nomination of Mr. Kellogg and his whole ticket?

Answer. There was. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction toward Mr. Kellogg on the part of those republicans who did not belong to my wing of the party. Of course, we did not like Mr. Kellogg, nor any of that side, at that time. We had been fighting for recognition; we did not like to be shut out.

Q. Was there not a protest, signed by Mr. Billings and Colonel Carter, and other gentlemen, Mr. Ladd and others, protesting against the manner in which the convention had been manipulated by the United States officials and Kellogg's nomination secured; and was not that protest sent to the President?

A. I think not. I think there were papers of this character made up by Mr. Billings, the defeated candidate for governor, and he may also have been supported in his papers by Mr. Wilson and General W. Carter; but I think those three will constitute the whole number signing any papers that went to Washington. I remember distinctly one of these gentlemen made a proposition to me to join in this protest, and I thought it was useless; that it made no difference.

Q. How long after the Kellogg ticket was nominated before that difference healed up?

A. Well, it was some time; I think the ticket was nominated on the 19th of June; the fusion took place on the 27th of August, or on or about that time.

Q. I would like to ask you a question or two, Governor Pinchback. There have been some references to the election of 1870. Was there a charge of fraud in the election of 1870?

A. It is supposed to surpass anything in the shape of an election ever held in any State in the Union.

Q. Was it charged by democrats?

A. By both parties.

Q. State whether there was a general apprehension or feeling entertained about the repetition of those frauds in the last election.

A. Yes, sir; so strong, indeed, was that feeling that all parties were bidding for the governor. The republicans made herculean efforts to retain him, because we were afraid that if he wielded his powers against us we were gone. You, gentlemen, know, many of you, the efforts I made, and how tenacious I stuck to him; for I confess I like to be on the winning side. To tell the truth, I did not think it possible to beat him. That is square, Governor.

Q. You and the governor were good friends in 1870?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In that election of 1870 you and the governor co-operated?

A. No, sir. In 1870 I was not friendly with him; I was fighting him, since I think of it.

Q. You took no part in it?

A. No, sir; only to advocate the election of the republican ticket in my own locality. * * * The governor's power is set down at about 20,000. It is supposed that Governor Warmoth is worth about 20,000 freemen to his side.

Q. What is your power worth?

A. It was supposed that I had a following, and I have heard my enemies estimate my strength at about 25,000.

Q. Stronger than the governor?

A. O, yes, sir. He always acknowledged he could not get along without me. * * * It was thought that his management of affairs and appointment of shrewd supervisors of registration, who understood the business well, would make a difference in the votes cast.

Q. A difference of 20,000?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You used to be a friend of mine—a pretty strong one?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. We made some lively fights together?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Against them custom-house men?
A. We did. I was one of your exceptional friends.
Q. Speaking about friends in 1870, was that the common talk among people on both sides?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did Governor Warmoth then have the appointment of supervisors of registration as now?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The same power?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did those supervisors have the appointment of commissioners of election as now?
A. Yes, sir. It was the same law precisely.

Hon. WILLIAM L. MCMILLEN:

Question. * * * * * Some questions were asked yesterday as to the number of white voters in New Orleans who voted the Government ticket. What is your opinion about that?

Answer. My belief is, that the number of white votes in the State of Louisiana for the republican party is, compared with the total vote, very small. I do not believe there are over 2,500 white voters in the city of New Orleans, and I do not believe there are over 2,000 white voters in the entire State of Louisiana, outside of New Orleans, who voted the republican ticket at the last election.

Q. Was it the understanding of all parties that this election in Louisiana was as peaceable and fair as you had ever before had?

A. I answer, I think that has been admitted by all persons and by all the newspapers in the State.

Q. Was it admitted in the newspapers of both parties after the election closed?

A. Yes, sir; it was admitted by the New Orleans Republican repeatedly in editorials after the election was held, and the result generally conceded.

Q. Was the New Orleans Republican the organ?

A. It is the leading republican paper of the State and the official organ of the State government. If you desire it, I can submit now, I think, an extract from an article in the New Orleans Republican, published as late as the 19th day of November.

Q. Do you remember it yourself? Did you see it at the time?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Read it if you please, stating the date first.

[From the New Orleans Republican, of the 19th November, 1872.]

"In our testimony we have so recently reviewed the positions of the parties contending for the control of the public affairs of the State, that it is unnecessary to comment further at this time. But as it is rumored that the President is preparing his message with the most kindly sentiments toward the southern people, we deem it a duty to add the testimony of the Republican as impressing those sentiments more strongly upon him. This testimony cannot but from our stand-point be accepted as impartial. The Republican, then, assures the President that no people were ever more orderly and obedient to law than the people of New Orleans and Louisiana, in the State and Federal elections recently held; that the relations between the races are kindly and cordial, the colored people voting by the side of the whites openly without military protection, State or Federal, and free from any insult or molestation whatever. Difficulties which have arisen since the elections are simply official, and are not alleged to have sprung from force or fraud of the people. The controversy now pending has not arisen from the casting of the vote, but from the counting of the vote. This indication of order and harmony is not only proper for executive consideration, but to counteract, so far as may be, the slander that New Orleans is under control of lawless mobs. This slander has not only prejudiced the mind of Congress, but has impeded immigration and excluded capital. Whatever, then, may be the result of legal or political questions, growing out of the Louisiana elections, the Republican deems it a duty to assure all whose opinion may have a bearing upon the political or commercial condition of New Orleans or Louisiana that the people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, have demeaned themselves well and deserve well of the country for their conduct in the recent State and Federal elections."

Q. That article not only states that the election was peaceable, but that both races voted, and that it was without fraud and fair?

A. Yes, sir; that it was not only peaceable but fair.

Q. Is it true that any white people were disfranchised in 1870 by a constitutional provision which was abrogated at this last election?

A. Yes, sir; the article disfranchising them was changed in 1870.

Q. Did not that disfranchise several thousand people?

A. It really disfranchised, whether legally or not, a great many people; it had the effect of disfranchising or making a vast body of the white people of Louisiana feel that they were laboring under disfranchisement. The majority of the white people of Louisiana had the impression when we made our constitution in 1868 that they were disfranchised by it.

Q. Have you stricken that article out?

A. Yes, sir; I am happy to say that we have made that much progress.

Q. The recent election was the first since the abrogation of that article?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you think that the abrogation of that article will account for the increase of the opposition vote in Louisiana?

A. I think it would account reasonably for a great deal more than that increase, as shown at the last election.

Q. Is it not true that in the election of 1872 there was more activity and zeal displayed by the white population than has ever been displayed since the reconstruction before?

A. I think so; I think, as a class, the white people took more general interest in the canvass than I have ever known before. The better class came out and took an interest in the last election, which is not true of any election previously, since reconstruction.

John Lynch went to Louisiana as a soldier in 1862; is the Lynch of the Lynch returning board.

Question. Was there not at the recent election in Louisiana a larger number of votes cast than was ever cast before at any general election?

Answer. As far as my knowledge goes, that is true.

Q. Was not the election generally peaceful and quiet in New Orleans; and was it not generally recognized as a fair one; and were there any disturbances at any poll in Louisiana, to your knowledge?

A. Yes, sir; from the evidence before me there was; in the case of officers who attempted to be present in conformity with the law just read.

Q. That law does not apply outside of New Orleans?

A. I will state generally that, in my opinion, on election day there was very little disturbance. It was very quiet and peaceable on election day.

On this point let these extracts suffice. They have insensibly encroached too far upon my time. They are from the evidence of persons, perhaps among the most candid, accredited, and responsible on the opposing sides. As disclosures of circumstances illustrative of the fairness and freedom of the election, for which purpose they are cited, it is obvious they are more general than particular. The countless details are plainly incompatible with my limited time; moreover, those details are various, vicious, and voluminous; but, according as they might be credited or discredited, would, no doubt, more or less color—strengthen or weaken—the one opinion or the other. On the question of fairness, however, and freedom in the election of 1872, I am of the opinion that these details are not of a nature to change the moral and judicial conclusion of every candid mind that has gone over them, that the election was a customary reconstructed Louisiana election, conducted by the authorities, and in obedience to the forms of law, in its results fortified by all the law's highest sanctions, and subject to be reviewed and set aside only after a lawful contest before the lawful tribunals, and in conformity with the forms prescribed by the laws of Louisiana for the trial of contested elections.

And finally, whether as to the registration, or the supervisors of registration; whether as to the commissioners of the election, or to the voters at the election; whether as to the total of the votes registered or not registered, or polled or not polled, as compared with the registrations or elections of 1868 and 1870, we stand confronted with this pivot fact; that down to this point in our inquiries, whether as to the manner or the substance of the election of 1872, the Federal authorities had no lawful business with it.

By the constitution of Louisiana, article 46, returns of all elections for members of the General Assembly shall be made to the secretary of state. Section 53 of the election law of March 16, 1870, heretofore quoted, directs the supervisors of registration to make returns to the governor of the sworn statements of the poll, as provided for therein; and the fifty-fourth section creates the board (to be composed of the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, and two other persons) of returning officers, therein defined, for all elections in the State, a majority of whom should constitute a quorum, with power to make the returns of all elections. And it is made the duty of that board, within ten days after the close of the election, to canvass and compile the statements of votes, and make return of the election to the secretary of state. Now it is objected to the direction given to the primary returns in these two sections of the election law, that it is in conflict with article 46 of the constitution. If that objection be good, it would be equally good as against all the rival boards. It is, however, probably not well taken. But however that may be, the question is not material to the main purpose of these remarks, and I will not pause to discuss it.

By the article 68 of the constitution of Louisiana it is provided that—

There shall be a secretary of state, who shall hold his office during the term for which the governor shall have been elected.

And by article 69 it is provided that—

The secretary of state, &c., shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State; and in case of any vacancy caused by the resignation, death, or absence of the secretary, &c., the governor shall order an election to fill said vacancies: Provided, The unexpired term to be filled be more than twelve months; when otherwise, the governor shall appoint a person to perform the duties of the office thus vacant until the ensuing general election.

And by article 96 it is provided that—

Impeachments of the governor, secretary of state, &c., shall be tried by the senate.

And the judgment to be rendered is limited to removal from office and disqualification from holding office.

By article 66 it is provided—

If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within five days after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly by adjournment prevent its return; in which case the same shall be returned on the first day of the meeting of the General Assembly after the expiration of said five days, or be a law.

At the election for governor in April, 1868, George E. Bovee was duly elected secretary of state; and on the 15th June ensuing he was duly commissioned, qualified, and installed in office.

In February, 1871, the Legislature of Louisiana passed and sent to the governor for his approval an act incorporating the Crescent City Water-Works Company, by which it was proposed to take the control of the water-works from the city of New Orleans and confer it upon a private company of individuals. Within four days after the enrolled bill reached the governor the General Assembly adjourned. Therefore, under article 66, the governor was not required to act upon the bill before the first day of the ensuing meeting of the General Assembly. In the May following the passage of the bill Mr. Bovee asked the governor whether he should promulgate it as a law. The governor's written reply was that the bill had come to him on the heel of the session; that it was still in his possession; and that as it was not a law, Bovee could not promulgate it; and that he intended to veto it on the meeting of the General Assembly. Nevertheless, in August following, Mr. Bovee substituted for the original a different bill, by the same title, and signed, certified, sealed, and promulgated the substitute as having become a law by the lapse of time, without the approval of the governor. Subsequently Mr. Herron averred, in a record, in the eighth district court, that that was an act of flagrant malfeasance in office, and justified Bovee's removal from office by the governor. The governor held he could suspend and appoint ad interim, and thereupon promptly issued the following order:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, August 29, 1871.

Whereas George E. Bovee, secretary of state, has, in violation of the constitution and laws of this State, caused to be promulgated as having become a law, "An act to incorporate the Crescent City Water-Works, to define its rights and duties, and to punish offenses committed against the franchises of said company and the public health," with his official certificate that the foregoing act, having been presented to the governor of the State of Louisiana for his approval, and not having been returned by him to the house of the General Assembly in which it originated within the time prescribed by the constitution of the State of Louisiana, has become a law without his approval; the said certificate having been made by the said Bovee with the knowledge communicated by the governor of the State of Louisiana, on the 4th day of May, 1871, that said bill would not become a law, or be acted upon, until the first day of the next session of the General Assembly; and whereas the said Bovee has knowingly, willfully, unlawfully, and with the purpose of imposing upon the people of the State as law that which he knows has not become law:

Now, therefore, I, H. C. Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, charged with the faithful execution of the laws under the constitution of the State, do issue this my order, suspending the said George E. Bovee from the office of secretary of state, and do hereby appoint F. J. Herron to discharge the duties of said office until the Legislature shall act upon the subject in accordance with the constitution.

Given under my hand and seal this 29th day of August, A. D. 1871, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-sixth.

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor of Louisiana.

O. D. BRAGDON, Private Secretary to the Governor.

Afterward were instituted proceedings No. 3556 in the eighth district court for the parish of Orleans, entitled the State of Louisiana et al. vs. Franklin J. Herron. The suit was brought by the attorney-general, Simeon Belden, at the instance of Mr. Bovee, under what is called the "intrusion in office act," to invalidate the action of the governor and for the reinstatement of Bovee. Herron defended, justifying the official action of the governor, and the court rendered the following judgment, to wit:

In this case, submitted to the court for determination, after deliberation, and for the reasons assigned in the written opinion this day delivered and filed, the court considering the law and the evidence to be in favor of the defendant,

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that this suit be dismissed at the cost of the plaintiffs.

Judgment rendered October 10, 1871, and signed October 20, 1871.

CHARLES M. EMMERSON,
Judge Third District Court, Parish Orleans,
Acting in absence of Hon. H. C. Dibble, judge.

From this judgment an appeal was taken to the supreme court, and finally by that court the appeal was dismissed for informality.

Pending the ensuing session of the General Assembly the governor, in his message to the house, charged Bovee with the above and other official offenses; the matter was referred to a committee with the usual powers, a great deal of testimony was taken, but in the mean time the end of the session approached, and on the application of Bovee time was given him until the ensuing session to prepare his defense, on the condition that Bovee's existing status should remain, and abide the action of the ensuing session. (This condition was subsequently violated by Mr. Bovee, who again brought suit against Herron and about December 2, 1872, obtained judgment in his favor as against Herron, who had then been superseded and Mr. Wharton installed.) But to resume: So Mr. Bovee was actually out and Mr. Herron actually in. And from the 29th day of August, 1871, down to, and after, the election of the 4th November, 1872, a period of over fourteen months, the government and people of Louisiana were permitted to possess themselves in peace. The omnipotence of Federal power was suffered to continue in its normal repose, and still the artillery's "bruised arms hung up for monuments."

Now, whether the removal of Mr. Bovee was illegal and tortious or was a constitutional and legal exercise of executive authority, was and is, comparatively, a matter of very little interest to the State and people, and that little interest could have been effectually subserved and vindicated in due course of remedies and time. But it was a matter of vital importance to the government and people of Louisiana that the wheels of the State government should not be blocked and the public business paralyzed, "while the petty inquiry was being investigated whether one or the other of two persons was the legal incumbent, entitled to exercise the duties of the office and receive the pay therefor." (2 Abbott's Prac. Rep., 290.)

Moreover, the charges against Mr. Bovee are uncontradicted in the record, and hence in this forum, for the purposes of this investigation, they must be considered as proven. And if, peradventure, his taking off by the act of the governor was premature and abnormal, let the governor be impeached and dealt with, if still amenable to trial; and if not, public opinion can be trusted to see to it that he shall not again have power so to pervert. But who is he, beside the conspirator and the spoilsman, who would complain that such an unfaithful official as Bovee was summarily deprived of power to practice an evil which poisons the law at its fountain-head and diffuses the infection through all the arteries of justice.

Article 61 of the constitution provides that—

The governor shall have power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session thereof, unless otherwise provided for in this constitution.

Having, as he evidently thought, legally made a vacancy in the office of secretary of state by the suspension of Mr. Bovee, the governor, it appears, relied upon article 61 as furnishing him ample authority for filling it by the appointment of Mr. Herron, to discharge the duties of said office until the Legislature shall act upon the subject in accordance with the constitution.

Now, eventually the Legislature met and acted, but did not conclude their action upon the accusation and suspension of Bovee, but by implication sanctioned the appointment of Mr. Herron on the part of the governor. The governor's idea, as disclosed in the record, was evidently that Herron's appointment, "until the Legislature shall act," and also the terms of article 61, limited his term to the duration of the ensuing session of the Legislature, and his term thus expiring with the session revived the original vacancy which arose from the supension of Bovee. It is however probable that if Herron was legally in at all, he was legally in until his successor "shall have been inducted into office," in virtue of article 122; to the effect that all officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their offices until their successors shall have been inducted into office, except in cases of impeachment or suspension.

But it would seem that Mr. Herron, so far as he was personally concerned, was at no time the lawful secretary of state, for the insuperable reason that he had been ineligible ab initio. Let the following uncontradicted facts speak to this point.

On the day of its date the governor received the following notice:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
New Orleans, November 12, 1872.

This is to certify that the books of this office show an indebtedness of eleven hundred and sixty-five dollars ($1,165) for licenses of 1871 against F. J. Herron, late tax-collector for the sixth district of New Orleans.

The above is for a balance due on licenses issued in 1871 to the said F. J. Herron, which should have been finally adjusted in the month of November, 1871, as prescribed in act 42 of 1871, and that notwithstanding the repeated demands made by this office upon the said F. J. Herron for a full settlement of the above-mentioned indebtedness, the amount due is still unpaid.

JAMES GRAHAM, Auditor.

By the provisions of the constitutional amendment of 1870—

No person who may at any time have been a collector of taxes, whether State, parish, or municipal, or who may have been otherwise intrusted with public money, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, or to any office of profit or trust under the State government, until he shall have obtained a discharge for the amount of such collections, and for all public moneys with which he may have been intrusted.

The revised statutes of Louisiana of 1871 provide that the auditor shall furnish the governor a list of defaulters to the State, and the amount of the several defalcations; forbids the governor to issue a commission to any person who appears to be a defaulter by reports on file in his office, (until he shall be satisfied the money has been paid,) and provides the governor shall order a new election, or make a new appointment, to fill vacancies thence arising.

Wherefore, on the morning of the 13th of November, 1872, the governor issued the following proclamation, in which he referred to the law, and concluded—

And whereas official information has been received at this office that F. J. Herron is indebted to the State for moneys collected by him as tax-collector in and for the sixth district of New Orleans:

Now, therefore, I, Henry C. Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, charged with the faithful execution of the laws under the constitution of the State, and in due observance of the provisions of the amendments to the same, do issue this my order removing F. J. Herron from the office of secretary of state, and do hereby appoint Jack Wharton to discharge the duties of said office.

Given under my hand and the seal of State this 13th day of November, 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

H. C. WARMOTH,
Governor.

And simultaneous therewith the governor issued the following appointment and commission to Mr. Wharton, (who was immediately sworn in,) and then put him into the actual possession of the office and archives of state; and Mr. Wharton then entered upon the performance of his official duties:

In the name and by the authority of the State of Louisiana, know ye, that I have nominated and constituted and appointed, and by these presents do nominate, constitute, and appoint Jack Wharton secretary of state in and for the State of Louisiana; and I do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same, from and after the date hereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the city of New Orleans, this 13th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1872, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-seventh.

H. C. WARMOTH.

The election was begun and concluded on the 4th day of November, 1872. The statute returning board, as constituted down to the evening of the 13th of November, consisted nominally of Governor Warmoth, Lieutenant-Governor Pinchback, F. J. Herron, secretary of state, John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson. On the 12th day of November, Warmoth, Pinchback, Herron, and Lynch, of the board, met in the governor's office to organize, and, having done so, adjourned over. On the 13th, at twelve o'clock m., after Mr. Wharton had been inducted into office, the same parties again met, in the same place, and Messrs. Pinchback and T. C. Anderson (the latter of whom was not present) were formally retired from the board on the ground of having been candidates, the first for Congress from the State at large, and the second for the State senate, at the pending election, which facts disqualified them by the terms of the fifty-seventh section of the election law of 1870, to wit:

That should any of the returning officers named in this act be a candidate for any office at any election, he shall be disqualified to act as returning officer for that election, and a majority of the remaining officers shall summon some respectable citizen to act as returning officer in the place of the one so disqualified.

Warmoth, Lynch, and Herron composed the remnant of the board. Thereupon Judge Ludeling administered the official oath to those three gentlemen. At this moment the newly-appointed secretary of state, Mr. Jack Wharton, (vice F. J. Herron, removed,) presented himself, exhibited his commission of secretary of state, the legal evidence of his having qualified as such officer, and also as a member of the returning board, together with the executive order removing Mr. Herron. Whereupon Mr. Wharton's official character was recognized in both those regards by Governor Warmoth, and the new secretary then took his seat as a member of the returning board. Mr. Herron protested, and pronounced the whole transaction illegal and void. Then Governor Warmoth produced the auditor's certificate of Mr. Herron's defalcations as tax-collector, and, from the constitution of Louisiana, read the amendment upon which he relied for the authority to remove Mr. Herron. Mr. Herron then began, but did not complete, a motion to fill the vacancies in the board. Governor Warmoth, in his capacity as president of the board, silenced Mr. Herron by referring to the fact that he was no longer a member of the board, and stated that any motion from him would be out of order and could not be entertained. Governor Warmoth then moved to fill the vacancies by the election of Messrs. Da Ponte and Hatch. The governor and Mr. Wharton voted in the affirmative. Mr. Lynch did not vote. Mr. Herron was heard again to protest. Such are the facts of this scene in the drama.

Now Mr. Lynch vaguely states that Mr. Herron, first in the order of time, moved, and put his motion, to fill the vacancies by the election of General Longstreet and Judge Hawkins, and that he and Herron voted in the affirmative; that Governor Warmoth voted for Da Ponte and Hatch; and that, if Mr. Wharton voted at all, he did not hear him. But it cannot be disguised that Mr. Lynch's statement, supported only by Mr. Herron, in this respect is, at best, halting and equivocal; and, more than that, he is flatly contradicted by Messrs. Warmoth, Sheridan, Wharton, Hatch, Da Ponte, Bragdon, and Judge W. H. Cooley, in all seven witnesses, who were present, and whose sworn statements are in the most positive terms.

But whether the one or the other motion was first in point of time is wholly immaterial. Surely Herron and his coadjutors were in no condition to dispute the right of the governor to create and then fill a vacancy in the office of secretary of state; for the governor had previously, as we have seen, on the 29th day of August, 1871, suspended Mr. Bovee, Mr. Herron's predecessor; and Mr. Herron thereupon received and accepted his appointment from the governor to fill the vacancy, and so affirmed the authority, and justified, and profited by, the exercise of the authority of the governor so to suspend and appoint. Mr. Herron, having now been ousted by the act of his appointing power, and Mr. Wharton actually performing the duties, and placed in the possession of the office and archives of state, and being, moreover, fortified by claim and color of title at least, he was, by virtue of his actual official position, one of the returning officers of election. Clearly, if the governor could suspend Mr. Bovee and install Mr. Herron in August, 1871, by the same authority he could remove Herron and install Mr. Wharton in November, 1872. At best Mr. Herron, like Mr. Bovee before him, in this official chase, stood remitted to his remedy at law; and in the mean time Secretary Wharton became, and was, as fully as his predecessor, Mr. Herron, had been, de facto secretary of state and returning officer; and as such his official acts of a public nature were valid and binding as against Herron and the rest of the world. An officer de facto is, prima facie, an officer de jure.

The doctrine of credence given to acts of de-facto officers is based on this, that the public has a right to be secure in the validity of acts of officers who under color of law exercise functions of office, and have been dealt with and trusted by the public.

So Messrs. Warmoth, Wharton, and Lynch, being the only returning officers, and the first two having voted in the affirmative and the one last named having not voted at all on the motion to elect Messrs. Da Ponte and Hatch to fill the vacancies, those gentlemen were pronounced by the president of the board duly elected. Hatch and Da Ponte were then sworn in by Judge Cooley, and seated at the board of canvassers as returning officers. In the mean time Mr. Lynch retained his seat at the head of the table, and these proceedings were all had in his presence and hearing, without one dissenting murmur or sign from him. His silence was of course equivalent to acquiescence, and though it is immaterial, he was as much bound by those proceedings as were his colleagues, Messrs. Warmoth and Wharton.

Finally, Mr. Herron appealed to Mr. Lynch to leave the board, and the latter, after being urged again and again, reflecting that he was in a minority, rose, deliberately seceded from the board, and silently withdrew from the room, in company with Mr. Herron, taking with him the minutes of the proceedings on the 12th, regardless of the objection urged by the governor. Then the governor, as the presiding officer of the board, pronounced the returning officers duly organized and ready for business; and, as the lawful custodian of the sealed returns of election, he proceeded to open and lay them before the board, for the purpose of canvassing and compiling them in pursuance of law. Mr. Da Ponte was appointed secretary, and Mr. Bragdon (private secretary of the governor) assistant secretary; and the board then ordered the returns to be tabulated and made ready for examination and compilation. And to facilitate the business Mr. Bragdon proceeded to employ some twenty-five clerks.

The board of returning officers, as thus made up, which may be called board No. 2, is called the Wharton board, and consisted of Messrs. Warmoth, Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte, (and Lynch, who had seceded.) Lynch and his confederates forthwith set up board No. 3, called the Lynch-Herron board, composed of Messrs. Lynch, Herron, Hawkins, and Longstreet. And now began another Iliad of "woes unnumbered." The curtain rose, and the battle of the boards and the comedy of the courts appeared and vanished, only to appear and vanish again amid the shifting scenes.

The election returns were in the lawful possession of the governor, who, under the election law of March, 1870, was the sole lawful custodian thereof, and he and the Wharton board alone controlled them. The Lynch board had consequently no election returns, and were therefore, to all appearances, impotent. But their way had, nevertheless, been blazed. They flew to the courts.

On the 14th of November they filed their petition (No. 13545) in the eighth district court for the parish of Orleans. Time will not permit me to cite the pleadings. I will state the main points. They claimed the Lynch-Herron board to be the board of returning officers, (together with the governor, whose name they presumed to use for form's sake;) Messrs. Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte were intruding and usurping the office of returning officers, and concluded with a prayer for judgment declaring them to be intruders and usurpers.

But the disorganizers soon saw that would not be effectual. The governor and the other returning officers, his colleagues, might still proceed in the performance of their official duty. Wherefore the plot must be thickened.

> Swelter'd venom sleeping got,
> Boil thou first i' the charmed pot!

They mended their hold. On the same day they filed a supplemental petition. In it they reaffirmed the statements of the original petition, averred that the proceedings were had for the further purpose of maintaining F. J. Herron in office as secretary of state, &c., averred that without an injunction the proceedings would be nugatory, and concluded with a prayer for the writ of injunction against Messrs. Wharton, Hatch, and Da Ponte, enjoining and restraining them from sitting or acting as returning officers, or from interfering with the petitioners as such, &c.

On the same day a cross-injunction was granted, on the motion of the Wharton board, against the Lynch-Herron board, restraining them from canvassing any pretended returns pending the litigation; and afterward, on the motion of the same parties, another injunction was granted, restraining the Lynch-Herron board from canvassing any returns other than the legal returns in the possession of the governor pending the litigation; and it appears that that injunction has never been dissolved, but was disregarded by the Lynch-Herron board throughout.

In the Lynch-Herron suit, on the day of the filing of the supplemental pleadings, an order was made by the court (Hon. H. C. Dibble) for the defendants, at eleven o'clock on the 16th of November, to show cause why the injunction should not issue, and commanding them to desist in the mean time from the acts complained of. The rule was issued and served. On that day Wharton and others answered, denying the jurisdiction of the court and setting up the facts upon the merits. On the 16th of November the rule was made absolute; Mr. Herron adjudged to be secretary of state; the Lynch-Herron board sustained; the injunction issued and served; and so far forth the election of the 4th of November, 1872, the executive department of Louisiana, and the State government were summarily tied up like the wallet of an unlicensed itinerant peddler, by the judgment of the eighth district court.

On the 22d of November a motion was made for a new trial; on the 2d of December following the motion was heard by Hon. W. A. Elmore, (who on the 21st of November had succeeded Judge Dibble as judge of the eighth district court.) On the 3d of December a new trial was granted. And thereupon, on motion of defendant's counsel, the suit was dismissed and the injunction dissolved, on the ground that the act of March 16, 1870, in virtue of which the complainants claimed to be the legal returning officers, had been repealed by the act of November 20, 1872, and the Lynch board abolished, and the complainants were without standing in court.

It appears that this judgment was final and irreversible unless on appeal prayed within ten days from the date of its rendition. But that judgment sealed the fate of the eighth district court. For on the 11th day of December—only seven intervening days—the Lynch-board legislature, then in blast, abolished it, created a new court, called the superior district court, with all ordinary and extraordinary jurisdiction requisite for the exigency, and transferred to it the docket of the abolished court. Whereupon Governor Pinchback, whom the Lynch-board legislature had made its governor upon the suspension of Governor Warmoth, appointed as judge of the new court Mr. Jacob Hawkins, who had just made the legislature by counting it in from certain fables, called by him and his colleagues returns. And then, on the 17th day of December, an appeal was granted from the aforesaid judgment of the eighth district court, fourteen days after its rendition, to the supreme court, on the petition, called a petition of intervention and appeal, of A. J. Field, who had not been a party to the proceeding in the eighth district court. He had been a candidate for attorney-general on the Kellogg ticket, and he claimed that he was pecuniarily interested and injured in that judgment, in its tendency to deprive him of his salary by declaring illegal the Lynch returning officers, who had returned him duly elected. And, finally, on the 23d day of January, 1873, he obtained a judgment in the supreme court avoiding and reversing the judgment of the eighth district court and sustaining the Lynch board. But that court was not thereupon abolished. It still survives.

We return to returning board No. 2—the Wharton board. The restraining order of the 14th November was served on the 15th, and that board, without having made any report, finally ceased to act; but on the 19th it was nevertheless further enjoined. So, board No. 2 being hors du combat, and the governor so far thwarted, not daunted, he resolved to bring his reserve into action. We will now see how this maneuver was accomplished.
